Mr. STEVENSON. Just one word. I have not interrupted the gentleman. That certainly gives them the right to regulate the terms for which debentures shall be made; that is, the terms which they shall not exceed.

Now, that being so, there is no necessity for writing it down here. If we did so we would just have a double statement of the same thing. The gentleman would attempt to put in here what would be misconstrued to mean that you must go to the Federal Reserve Board every time you start to issue one set of debentures and be required to get its imprimatur on the time, rate of interest, and all the conditions under each set of debentures, whereas they ought to make regulations that are general in their nature and prescribe for all these debentures at one time, so that there will be a set of rules and record and regulation which everybody understands, and they will not be required to pass upon each specific set of debentures.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I thoroughly agree with what the gentleman says. Furthermore, if the language that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] proposes to put in here is inserted, the last part of the sentence will not apply at all. We put in a limit of ten times the capital stock, and to put all that he suggests in between will mean something that does not relate to the last part at all.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. That limitation provided there does not refer to the character of the debenture. That will all be regulated by the regulations. But that refers to the number and amount of them in comparison with the capital stock that can be issued, and the gentleman from Oklahoma is mixing up limitations on the amount with the terms and conditions of the issue.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while I am on that subject let me add that the gentleman from Oklahoma made a labored argument that we ought to have some provision for the security of the debentures, and asserts that that is wide open. The term "debenture" is defined by the dictionary by which we go as "a bond given in acknowledgment of a debt and providing for repayment out of some specified fund or source of income." In other words, a debenture is an obligation issued which specifies a certain source, and pledges the sum coming from that source, and is in all essentials a secured paper.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. That definition does not apply to bonds.

Mr. STEVENSON. Bonds is not what the gentleman is arguing about. The gentleman made his argument about debentures.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. While it is true that on lines 1, 2, and 3 of page 5 the Federal Reserve Board is given power to prescribe rules and regulations, why is it that the bill provides "ten times its capital stock" instead of six times?

Mr. STEVENSON. Because the Committee of the Whole a while ago said it would not change it. And another reason is this, that the limitation of this might be a great deal more extended, and possibly ought to be, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] said a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] a few minutes ago stated that these promissory notes were bank notes; in other words, notes of circulation. Now, I think the gentleman on reconsideration will see that that is entirely untenable. They are promissory notes, which have a legal definition. The bank notes that circulate are national bank notes, and these are not national bank notes. This is expressly excluded from the provisions of the Federal reserve act, and any other kind of a bank note that circulates, except a national bank note, is subject to a 10 per cent tax, and therefore these notes are not designed for circulation, as the gentleman suggested a while ago, and that is an entirely untenable position.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] has delivered his speeches on the "installment plan" to-day. In his last one he referred to the fact that I said that cotton would bring 6 cents a pound more if the exchange situation was such that the Englishman could pay the full price. He says I made an absurd argument, and that in order to make that so the English would have to buy all the cotton. Why, the gentleman does not know the first law of economics. If the Englishman was here with his exchange, prepared to pay 6 cents a pound more for cotton than it is now bringing in the market, the American who sought to buy cotton would have to go up 6 cents, and all of it would bring the additional 6 cents. My argument is entirely sound.

Not only that, but the gentleman refers to the cotton mills of the Piedmont, South Carolina. I will say that the cotton mills of the Piedmont say to the people of the United States and the Congress of the United States that they want to be placed on an equal footing with the cotton mills in Manchester, with the cotton mills in Germany, and with the cotton mills in France. They want to be placed so that they can sell their goods directly to South America and to the other great nations of the world as well. They want to be on an equal basis with the manufacturers of England, France, and Germany, and they do not care if it does make some little difference in the price of cotton if they can go to South America and sell their cotton goods on equal terms. They think they can compete with any nation under the sun, and they can pay the American farmer what his product is worth and sell their goods at a profit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are several things that the gentleman has said, but that is the one that I desired to refer to particularly, because he referred to the situation down with us.

And there is this about it: The whole situation here is being hampered by the proposition that this is merely to finance the present condition of the world. It is not that at all. The idea of this bill is to place this country and the merchants and manufacturers and farmers of this country on an equality with the merchants and manufacturers and farmers of every other country in the world when it comes to going into the world markets and to provide cargoes for the great American fleet which we are building up and to put the American flag and the American trade on every sea, in every part of the world. It is not any temporary measure merely to finance the broken-down countries of Europe. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 10, noes 44.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we can not agree upon limiting debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. CANNON. I have an amendment which I desire to offer, and I do not want to lose my right to offer it. I want to move to strike out from line 17 the words "promissory notes."

Mr. PLATT. I think 25 minutes would cover it.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether it would or not. I think the gentleman had better let it run.

Mr. KING. I will object to it.

Mr. PLATT. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, in line 15 the corporation is authorized to borrow and lend money without limit. The authority to borrow money and give credit is absolutely unlimited. The clause, "under the limitation of the Federal Reserve Board," does not apply to the power to borrow money. The next clause says, "to issue debentures, bonds, and promissory notes, with such limitations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe," but the word "thereon" refers back to only debentures, bonds, and promissory notes. So the only limitation on the corporation is that it can not issue bonds and debentures to exceed ten times the capital stock and surplus. But they can have unlimited outstanding liabilities. In other words, they can borrow ten or twenty times the amount of the capital stock and still issue bonds and debentures and promissory notes up to ten times the capital stock and surplus.

The argument has been made that national banks make loans up to ten times the amount of the capital stock, but that represents practically all of their liabilities. So I move to strike out the word "thereon," and this would limit the outstanding debts and liabilities of the corporations to ten times the capital stock and surplus. But to give them authority to borrow money unlimitedly and then, in addition, issue debentures and bonds up to ten times their capital stock and surplus is giving them too much power of expansion in credit. I think perhaps it was the intention of the committee that the word "thereon" should refer back to all indebtedness. Is it not a sufficient power of credit to allow a corporation to go in debt and borrow money up to ten times its capital stock and surplus?

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman has touched another point on which the committee had considerable discussion. These institutions are to be owned largely by national banks.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman does not know that.

Mr. PLATT. They are not to be managed by babes in arms; they are going to be managed by men who know their business and not by a lot of kids.

Mr. MORGAN. Some farmers may want to organize one of these corporations.

Mr. PLATT. That is true; and it may be that the gentleman's amendment might not do any harm, and yet it might. The experience with which these institutions are going to be built up is largely to be acquired, and the Federal Reserve Board has to make limitations under the provision of ten times the capital stock and surplus. That would give them leeway. If this was a national bank financed by a lot of farmers in Oklahoma that did not know anything about banking, the gentleman's amendment might be all right; but these institutions are going to be managed by bankers.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the gentleman does not make a little circle around New York and assume only citizens of New York will organize these corporations. I understand that the farmers of Oklahoma will have a perfect right to organize one of these corporations, and the gentleman is not going to exclude them, and perhaps they might show that they understand finance about as well as they do in New York. I am sure they know how to go in debt, and this bill gives unlimited authority to go in debt.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman knows the farmers of Oklahoma better than I do, and it is, of course, true that they will not be excluded from forming one or more of these corporations. But this is, after all, a big proposition. A large part of this foreign business is now done by the great private banking houses like J. P. Morgan & Co. and we want to get it out of their control and break up the monopoly, but we do not want to tie the people up so that they can not compete with private bankers who have no limitations put on them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this amendment is a proper safeguard. We ought not to allow this corporation to have outstanding liabilities to exceed ten times the capital stock. We ought not to leave unlimited power to borrow and then in addition issue bonds and debentures up to ten times the capital stock, and I hope the amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 20, after the word "surplus," insert "and the United States shall in no case be liable for the payment of the principal or interest on any bonds or debentures issued by any corporation organized under this act."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, the members of the committee will recall the fact that we authorized the organization of the Federal land banks. There was nothing in that act which made the United States liable for the Federal land bank bonds. I understand that some of the most eminent lawyers in the United States have given an opinion that the United States is morally bound to pay the bonds issued by the Federal land banks.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. In just a moment. When we authorized the War Finance Corporation to issue bonds section 17 of that act contained a provision that the United States shall not be liable for the payment of any bonds or other obligations or interest thereon issued or incurred by the corporation, nor shall it incur any liability because or by reason of any liability of the corporation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the United States is a subscriber to the stock of the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; but notwithstanding that the provision was specifically placed in the act creating it that the United States would not be responsible for its bonds, we give these corporations the name "Federal." That carries the idea that these are institutions of the Federal Government of the United States of America.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. And if we do not specifically declare that the Federal Government is not responsible for these bonds, the great lawyers of the country will come up and say that the United States is morally bound to pay these bonds and debentures, and under the ideals of this Government the United States is supposed to make good not only its obligations which are legal but its obligations which are moral. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The Government of the United States has no stock in the joint-stock land banks.

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yet they have been carrying advertisements at times in the papers saying that their bonds are instrumentalities of the United States Government, carrying the inference that they are United States bonds, although they do not specifically say so.

Mr. MORGAN. All I ask the committee to do is to follow the act that Congress passed creating the War Finance Corporation. This can do no harm, and while I have not had very good success with my other amendments, as this is the last that I shall offer, at least on this section, I hope that Members will agree to it.

Mr. STEVENSON. If we establish the precedent of prescribing in a statute that merely provides for incorporation that the United States shall not be responsible for the obligations of the corporation created, will we not carry the implication that wherever the United States organizes a corporation without that prescription it will be liable?

Mr. MORGAN. Why give these corporations exclusive right to the use of the word "Federal"?

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to know what eminent lawyer has given the opinion, after due consideration, that the Government of the United States is chargeable for Federal farm-load bonds?

Mr. MORGAN. I have heard it stated on this floor, and I understand that it is a recognized fact, that the Hon. Charles E. Hughes did, and I think he will be recognized as an eminent lawyer.

Mr. PHELAN. We gave the national banks the exclusive right to the use of the word "national," and no question has ever been raised that the United States Government is responsible for any of their bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MORGAN) there were—ayes 15, noes 38.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 17, after the word "bonds," strike out the words "and promissory notes."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, when we come to read subdivision (b) of this section, which provides for the establishment and maintenance for the transaction of its business of agencies in the United States and branches or agencies in foreign countries, in connection with the words which I seek to strike out, it seems to me that promissory notes could be issued by the millions. That is right, is it not?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. If they undertook to circulate them as money, would they not be taxable under the Federal statute at 10 per cent?

Mr. CANNON. In one respect I would just as soon have a good promissory note as a bank note, but they can gather up any amount of money and issue promissory notes all the way from ten to a million dollars. Would they not have the power to go out into the market and establish branch banks and issue promissory notes?

Mr. STEVENSON. They are prohibited from taking deposits, and therefore they could not become competitors with the country banks.

Mr. CANNON. They could advertise and say that they wanted to borrow so much money, and that they would give their note at 5 or 6 per cent, or any other rate, in any amount desired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. The last statement should be limited, because there is a provision in the bill that the banks can not borrow over ten times their capital stock and surplus, so they can not issue promissory notes to any extent they may desire.

More than that, the Federal Reserve Board can limit them still further if they so desire.

Mr. CANNON. But you can not organize one of these concerns with less than $2,000,000.

Mr. PHELAN. That is true.

A MEMBER. Vote!

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, the gentleman says "vote," and, of course, I may be "looney"——

Mr. KING. Oh, I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. CANNON. I think I am right—promissory notes! Later on we will see where the kick comes in when we come to consider subdivision (b). Making a rough guess, without being a member of this committee and without having studied this bill, I think we are creating corporations or allowing them to be created, with the establishment of agencies anywhere in the country, in Oklahoma or elsewhere, that can transact business and issue promissory notes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, for the sake of the RECORD I want to quote the national-bank act, first, in reply to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] said. Without going into the question of whether or not the promissory notes of these banks could be interpreted to mean circulating notes, and in order to save time, I simply want to read from the national-bank act.

Mr. CANNON. I do not claim those are bank notes.

Mr. PHELAN. I am answering the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED]. The provision as it exists to-day and as it will exist, even though we pass this bill and make it a law, provides—

That every person, firm, association, other than national-bank associations, and every corporation, State bank or State banking association, shall pay a tax of 10 per cent on the amount of their own notes used for circulation and paid out by them.

Therefore, whatever else you may say, under this particular provision there is no danger in the world that these notes ever can be used as circulating notes. That, I think, definitely disposes of the objections made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED]. Now, to come to the objection raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. He raised a very pertinent point. But if these corporations are going to do business we must give them permission to issue their promissory notes. For instance, you pick up a paper and you read that the American Telephone Co. is issuing its notes.

You read that the Pennsylvania Railroad issues its promissory notes, and so every very large corporation that comes to my mind at the present moment does the same thing. If the corporation organized under this act wants cash for a short time, if the present situation confronted them where they feel they would have to pay too high a rate of interest for a long-time obligation, it may be to their advantage and to the advantage of everybody else that they borrow the money upon a short-time promissory note.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. In just a minute. I say we ought to give them the power to make a short-time obligation or a promissory note whereby they can borrow the money. That is the first part. We ought to give the power. Next I believe we ought to limit that. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that there was no limitation at all at first in the bill, and I in the committee first made that proposition. It was pretty difficult to know just what limit to put. This is a new kind of business. We did not want to restrict these corporations so they can not carry out the very purpose of the act, yet we ought to put in a restriction to protect the public. The way we finally did it is this: We put an outside limit of ten to one on the capital and surplus, and, in addition, we stated very plainly in the bill that the Federal Reserve Board could limit the amount of the obligations of this kind put out still further, and by putting such provision into the act we put the Federal Reserve Board upon its guard to see that there should not be any abuses of the privileges which were granted. In other words, we grant privileges which are necessary, we believe, for these corporations to have, and it seems to me under the restrictions we impose there will not be any abuse of the privilege. I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman has spoken about the right of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and other corporations, railroads and otherwise, to issue notes. I want to know if there were a show-down to-day in the United States, how many of them are not bankrupt that have had that power?

Mr. PHELAN. I will say in reply to the gentlemen that is one very good reason why we ought to have this bill passed, because corporations in many of our States have not been subject to a proper supervision, and in this bill we have seen to it very carefully that they shall be subject to the most rigid examination and regulation by the Federal Reserve Board, a body excellently qualified for the purpose.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Just one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota offers the following amendment: Page 5, lines 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, after the words "United States," strike out "and to receive only such deposits within the United States as may be incidental to or for the purpose of carrying out transactions in foreign countries or dependencies or insular possessions of the United States."

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has called attention to certain language on page 6, lines 12, 13, and 14, in which it is proposed to give authority to these banks to establish and maintain for the transaction of their business agencies in the United States and branches or agencies in various countries, and so forth. Now, that, taken in connection with the provisions on page 5, points very strongly in the direction of branch banks in the United States.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Not just now. It seems to me that we want to go pretty slow on any proposition of that kind. This word "incidental," line 23, where it appears in the language "may receive deposits in the United States and money incidental to carry out transactions in foreign countries," and so forth, is a pretty broad word. Nearly any kind of a deposit made in a bank may be incidental to such purpose. You may come into a bank and say in a general way, "I am going to do some business in a foreign country, and I want to open a checking account in your bank." It may be incidental in a general way to your foreign business. It looks to me that this bill leaves it wide open for deposits in this country.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will yield, there are eight foreign banking corporations already in existence, and some of them pretty large organizations, one of them——

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I am talking about business here——

Mr. PLATT. One employing 2,000 people. They are doing business in the United States. They are, of course, under State charter and allowed to receive deposits and have branches, if they want to, and they are owned in part by the national banks. But surely they are not going to compete with their own owners. Why should they? We have put in here exactly the restriction which the Federal Reserve Board prescribes to them about receiving deposits.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. This bill authorizes branches.

Mr. PLATT. Now, if we had cut this out and had not put it in at all, most Members of the House never would have known anything about it. We put the restriction in which the Federal Reserve Board applies to banks already in existence. Otherwise they could receive any kind of deposits, so far as the act itself is concerned. But they are owned by national banks, largely, and are not going to compete with themselves.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. You think they are not. What are they authorized to do by this bill?

Mr. PLATT. There never has been any complaint of competition of the institutions already in business with the national banks. The national banks own stock in them and do that partly for the purpose of getting business from them.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman knows there have been various attempts to establish branch banking institutions throughout the Nation, and I do not propose to sit here and let a bill be passed to let them do it. We know how it works in other countries.

Mr. PLATT. A lot of confusion comes from our using the word "banks." These are not banks in the ordinary sense. They are financial corporations.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. They are banks. You are giving them such authority here.

Mr. PLATT. We have got to give some latitude, because we do not know in which direction they will grow. There are two classes of institutions provided for here.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. We do not want them to grow in the direction of branches throughout the United States.

Mr. PLATT. The deposits they can take are only incidental to their foreign business, and their owners—and they are owned largely by national banks—will see that they do not.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Many national banks have been ambitious to have branches throughout the United States—and under this bill they can do that very thing. You say the banks are going to own them. How do you know they are not going to be ambitious to have branches throughout the United States?

Mr. PLATT. Let us take another point of view. The head officers of these concerns will probably be in the seaport cities.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment for the purpose of asking a question. The gentleman says the national banks are stockholders, or would be, in these proposed corporations?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I think the national banks have got to have a capital of $2,000,000 before they would be allowed to do it.

Mr. PLATT. No. One million dollars. It is true that for national banks to subscribe to the corporations already in existence they must have a capital of $1,000,000. But we have not put that limit on in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. You put no limitation on.

Mr. PLATT. Any national bank, not to exceed 10 per cent of its capital stock.

Mr. CANNON. In the national banks you preserve all the organizations that are made. And capitalists in New York—and I speak of them with respect, the Morgans and the Guaranty Trust Co., and others that I do not know—and in Chicago, you preserve their organizations. Do you say the national banks have stock in the other corporations?

Mr. PLATT. They have stock in the eight foreign financial corporations already organized and doing business.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. If the gentleman will allow me, and then I will sit down and quit kicking. My objection is this, that the great city banks, making large dividends—and I have no objection to their making good earnings—pile up all kinds of deposits, in the hundreds—in the aggregate—and thousands of millions of dollars. That is all right. But I feared that this bill would enable them to do it in a larger degree at the expense of the country national banks. I know two or three little national banks that are compelled to leave from $50,000 to $150,000 and $200,000 without interest with the Federal reserve. They do not care to borrow money in the Federal reserve bank. They will be glad to have the privilege of loaning what little money they have at a low rate of interest. And there is the kick. I will say to the gentleman that I do not know how it is in New York, but there is a kick in Illinois and Indiana, which is pretty severe, against the present system of the Federal reserve bank. And this, I fear, will extend it.

Mr. PLATT. The big national banks already have the right to establish foreign branches, and the largest bank in the country already has some 70 foreign branches. This would give the smaller banks a chance to cooperate and join together. Any big bank can go into business itself.

Mr. CANNON. The $50,000 banks or the $100,000 banks, with $150,000 or $200,000 deposit, are not going to take any stock in this, and yet in the aggregate their capital is large in the United States.

Mr. PLATT. We hope they will.

Mr. CANNON. They will not, because they can not make any money by doing it.

Mr. PLATT. Then these corporations will not be profitable. But we think they will be.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that this bill in its operation, if it is enacted into law—and I fear it—will further extend the power of the great institutions in New York, Chicago, and other large centers at the expense of the banks that now make, instead of 10 and 12 and 15 per cent, 7 or 8 per cent, and are very fortunate if they can make it.

Mr. PLATT. It is designed to do exactly the opposite. It is designed to give the little banks a chance to cooperate.

Mr. CANNON. They do not want to do it.

Mr. PLATT. If they do not want to do it, let them keep out.

Mr. CANNON. The bill enables them to establish branches.

Mr. PLATT. It does not do anything of the kind, except in foreign countries. We have already authorized that.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; under this bill further on it is so provided.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Was there a time fixed?

The CHAIRMAN. The time is limited—five minutes on each side of the amendment.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am just a little bit embarrassed, being a member of the committee, but I want to make an explanation. When this bill came from the Senate it provided that these institutions could receive deposits generally. It was at my suggestion in the committee that any restriction was placed in the bill, such as confining deposits entirely to deposits that are incident to foreign trade. I told the committee, and I still insist, that this is too broad a latitude for these institutions, and I will try to explain to you in this brief time the reasons why.

These institutions are largely investment institutions, and they are going to issue longer time credits than our banks are able to issue. Therefore I do not believe that it is proper to let these institutions receive any demand deposits. We confine the deposits to such deposits as are incidental to the foreign trade. Let me point out to you that under the Webb-Pomerene law, recently passed, we are creating in this country a great many large export institutions which will have at their command deposits which are incident to this foreign trade. I can see where there is going to be a good many millions of dollars of deposits under the terms of this act, and I should dislike very much in that event to see these institutions permitted to receive demand deposits and issue long-time securities thereon. I do not see the danger that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] points out; that is to say, that this bill will permit branch banking in the United States. I am absolutely opposed to branch banking so long as we are operating under the Federal reserve act, and I can see nothing here to permit that. Neither can I see the danger pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. But I have tried to make it clear to you that these institutions, in my judgment, should not be permitted to receive deposits and issue long-time obligations. The working capital which these banks will require should come from their capital stock and the sale of their securities, and they should not be permitted to use deposits as capital, because the time might come when for some reason the demand deposits might be called, and if the deposits had been loaned out on long time these banks would have to borrow in the open market to meet this demand. I want to now explain more fully my position in regard to this bill, and especially this particular part of it. A word of explanation as regards the bill of exchange which is in such general use in Great Britain will not be out of place now.

A bill of exchange is the currency in the commerce of Great Britain. It is strictly a commercial credit instrument. No historian seems to know its exact origin, though we are told in Gibbins's History of the Commerce of Europe it was in use among the Greek traders 300 B. C. It was the creature of the law merchant, invented by traders to meet the credit needs of traders, and for many centuries none but merchants could draw or accept a bill of exchange. Such is now and always has been the law in France and such was the law in England for generations after the introduction of that credit instrument into English commerce. Later, however, it became permissible for any person in England to draw or accept a bill of exchange.

A bill of exchange under the present law of England would mean no more than a promissory note were it not for the influence exercised by the Bank of England in rendering that law nugatory. For it is not the name of the former that makes it a safer credit instrument than the latter, but the fact that it represents a real commercial transaction and is drawn by a guarantor and seller of commercial credit that is the producer or distributer of commerce. If the retail merchant were permitted to draw bills of exchange on his customers they would represent consumption and not production. If a banker were permitted to draw or accept a bill of exchange it may represent a finance or speculative transaction. But where both drawers and acceptors are confined to the producers and distributers of commerce and the head of the credit system of the country in control of the great distributers of commerce and guarantors of commercial credit frowning on all bills which are not drawn and accepted by that class, such a general law as now exists in England on that subject does little harm.

I do not know of a single English bank which accepts a time bill of exchange, and I am quite sure that not one of them would dare place one of its time acceptances on the open market, for by such act it would lose its position at the Bank of England, the head of the British commercial credit system. A bank has too many demand-payable obligations to accept a time bill of exchange. An English merchant of second-rate credit must pay a merchant or "acceptance house" of first-rate credit to become the acceptor of the bills of exchange drawn on him for his purchases of merchandise. Hence it is that British merchants obtain credit at from 33⅓ to 50 per cent less rate than our own merchants, notwithstanding the fact that within the past five years we have loaned their country nearly ten billions of capital, simply because of the superiority of the British credit system over our own.

I believe the present bill affords the Congress an opportunity to give to our foreign traders a credit institution conforming to the British "acceptance house." As to the origin and purpose of that distinctive British credit institution, I beg to quote from The Meaning of Money, by Hartley Withers, editor London Economist since 1916, a scholar of high standing and man of an actual experience in a London bank and stock-exchange house, and author of the following books: Stocks and Shares, 1910; Money Changing, 1913; Poverty and Waste, 1914; War and Lombard Street, 1915; International Finance, 1916; Our Money and the State, 1917; and The Business of Finance, 1918. On page 160, The Meaning of Money (1909), Mr. Withers says:

> It is easy to understand how this distinct class of accepting houses grew out of the importing merchants who originally accepted bills in the course of their importing business; that is, accepted orders on themselves to pay for goods which were in the process of being forwarded to them. The readiness with which the acceptances of the different merchants would be discounted and turned into cash would vary considerably with the difference in their reputations and standing, and the caution with which they were credited in the matter of conducting their business. And the varying readiness with which certain acceptances were discounted would inevitably express itself in the varying rates at which their bills could be placed. It would thus naturally follow that it would profit merchants of second-rate standing to give a commission to those whose reputations were more exalted in order to secure a more attractive signature than their own, and so get back the commission and a little more by being able to finance their operations more cheaply than by the means of their own signatures.
> The merchants of first-rate credit would thus find that they could let out the use of their reputations on profitable terms and proceed to specialize in this branch of business, which consisted in examining the bill put before them for acceptance, keeping themselves well acquainted with the means and standing of the drawers of them, and giving their acceptances for a commission to such people as fulfilled the requirements of their discrimination.

In pointing out the danger of the deposit banker becoming the acceptor of time bills of exchange the same author, on page 164, says:

> It is also very essential that the banks should remember that the least irregularity or carelessness on their part in the selection of the paper that they hall-mark with their acceptance might have very far-reaching effects if it came to light and were the subject of city comment, because the general body of their customers and depositors would be extremely likely to misunderstand it, and that what would be a mere indiscretion in an acceptance house, which does not depend for its existence on the confidence of the uninstructed multitude, might mean disaster to a bank which does.

If we clothe these foreign banks with the power to do this strictly commercial act of accepting time bills of exchange, then such banks will deny banking privileges to such traders as engage in that commercial business or exact a toll on them for doing the same. Furthermore, it will mean that the big banks of our financial centers will dominate all our foreign commerce, just as the big German banks dominated the foreign commerce of Germany, except a few who were fortunate enough to be able to use the English credit machinery. This is the time for us to establish the freedom of all our credit and commercial institutions.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to find the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] and myself in accord on this proposition. As I tried to point out the other day, there will be organized in this country great export propositions covering two or three counties or half a State. They will have a right, under this bill as now drawn, to put their deposits in one of these banks, and it seems to me it will be the means of draining the deposits in all the banks of this country, especially where export associations under the Webb law are created and organized. For that reason I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: Page 5, lines 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, after the words "United States," strike out "and to receive only such deposits within the United States as may be incidental to or for the purpose of carrying out transactions in foreign countries or dependencies or insular possessions of the United States."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I think it is rather important that this language should not be stricken out, and for this reason: There are a number of these corporations already in existence, operating under State charters, and it is not at all certain that they will come in and take Federal charters. They have broader powers than we have given here. Some of them have told me that they see no reason why they should take out Federal charters. But we want them to come in, because in that case we can give them closer supervision.

This is the restriction that the Federal Reserve Board puts on the banking corporation already operating under the amendment of September 7, 1916, and there has been no complaint from any national bank of any competition with them under this restriction. A man sends in some money to buy foreign exchange. Why should they not take it as a deposit? Why should not the money remain incidentally in that bank for a very short time? The Federal Reserve Board makes this same restriction, and, as I say, no national bank has complained of it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. There is nothing in this bill to prevent a man from sending in this money.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose if we struck out this provision they could perhaps go on and receive deposits.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. They can send money in for any foreign purpose.

Mr. PLATT. I want to be fair with the gentleman, and——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from North Dakota by his last statement says they can do just what this provides.

Mr. PLATT. That is what I say.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. They can act as the agent for the disposal of any money that is put in their hands.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 7, after the word "herein," insert "whenever a corporation organized under this section receives deposits in the United States it shall carry reserves in such amounts as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, but in no event less than 5 per cent of its deposits."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) To establish and maintain for the transaction of its business branches or agencies in foreign countries, their dependencies or colonies, and in the dependencies or insular possessions of the United States, at such places as may be approved by the Federal Reserve Board and under such rules and regulations as it may prescribe; and to establish and maintain such additional branches or agencies as the Federal Reserve Board may from time to time authorize even in counties or dependencies not specified in the original organization certificate.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 6, line 13, after the word "business," insert the words "agencies in the United States and."

Page 6, line 18, after the word "prescribe," strike out the words "and to establish and maintain such additional branches or agencies as the Federal Reserve Board may from time to time authorize even in," and insert in lieu thereof the word "including."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in lines 12 and 13, on page 6, after the word "agencies," I move to insert the words "but not branches."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON to the committee amendment: Page 6, line 13, after the word "agencies," insert the words "but not branches."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the amendments which have been adopted and which have been somewhat discussed, I fear that "agencies" could in substance amount to branches. I do not know how it is in New York, but in some of the large cities of the West they want to establish branches that will run out from Chicago. I use Chicago as an illustration. It might be Indianapolis, if you choose, or one on the Wabash, or a dozen branches. It is very seriously discussed that the national banks can establish branches. Is that prohibited by law?

Mr. PLATT. It is; but I want to say to the gentleman that I am willing to accept his amendment.

Mr. CANNON. My compliments to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the next committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) With the consent of the Federal Reserve Board to purchase and hold stock or other certificates of ownership in any other corporation organized under the provisions of this section, or under the laws of any foreign country or a colony or dependency thereof, or under the laws of any State, dependency or insular possession of the United States not transacting business in the United States, except such as in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board may be incidental to its international or foreign business: Provided, however, That no corporation organized hereunder shall invest in any one corporation an amount in excess of 10 per cent of its own capital and surplus, except in a corporation engaged in the business of banking, when 15 per cent of its capital and surplus may be so invested.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 7, line 3, after the word "States," insert the words "engaged principally in the business of banking or in any other financial operation of the kinds authorized by this section, but."

Page 7, line 9, after the word "that," insert the words "except with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board."

Page 7, line 12, after the word "surplus," strike out the comma and the words "except in a corporation engaged in the business of banking, when 15 per cent of its capital and surplus may be so invested" and insert in lief thereof the following: "Provided further, That no corporation organized hereunder shall purchase, own, or hold stock or certificates of ownership in any other corporation organized hereunder or under the laws of any State which is in substantial competition therewith, or which holds stock or certificates or ownership in corporations which are in substantial competition with the purchasing corporation.

"Nothing contained herein shall prevent corporations organized hereunder from purchasing and holding stock in any corporation where such purchase shall be necessary to prevent a loss upon a debt previously contracted in good faith; and stock so purchased or acquired in corporations organized under this section shall within six months from such purchase be sold or disposed of at public or private sale unless the time to so dispose of same is extended by the Federal Reserve Board."

Mr. WINGO. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that in line 19, page 7, after the word "certificates," the word "or" should be "of."

Mr. PLATT. That is right. That is a typographical error.

Mr. WINGO. I move to strike out the word "or" after the word "certificates," in line 19, page 7, and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO to the committee amendment: On page 7, line 19, after the word "certificates," strike out the word "or" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments as amended.

The committee amendments as amended were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

No corporation organized under this section shall carry on any part of its business in the United States except such as, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, shall be incidental to its international or foreign business: And provided further, That except such as is incidental and preliminary to its organization no such corporation shall exercise any of the powers conferred by this section until it has been duly authorized by the Federal Reserve Board to commence business as a corporation organized under the provisions of this section. No corporation organized under this act shall engage in commerce and trade, or deal in commodities or foodstuff, or as a condition of extending credit dictate or attempt to control the buyer or seller in the disposition of commodities, or interfere with the freedom of competition in the sale of commodities.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 8, line 14, after the word "section," strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including line 19, and insert the following:

"No corporation organized under this section shall engage in commerce or trade in commodities except as specifically provided in this section, nor shall they control or fix or attempt to control or fix the price of any such commodities. The charter of any corporation violating this provision shall be subject to forfeiture in the manner hereinafter provided in this section. It shall be unlawful for any director, officer, agent, or employee of any such corporation to use or to conspire to use the credit, the funds, or the power of the corporation to fix or control the price of any such commodities, and any such person violating this provision shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, on page 9, line 6, to strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and," and in line 7, strike out the words "or both, in the discretion of the court," and insert a period after the word "year," in line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DOWELL to the committee amendment: Page 9, line 6, after the figures "$5,000," strike out the word "or" and insert in lieu thereof the word "and," and in line 7, strike out "or both, in the discretion of the court," and insert a period after the word "year."

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield just one minute? I will suggest to the chairman that he accept that amendment. We may save some time. It is agreeable on this side to accept the amendment, and we may save a little time by it.

Mr. DOWELL. I think it is a good amendment.

Mr. PLATT. It seems to me that it ought not to be adopted; it might result in placing some employee in the position where he would be the goat.

Mr. DOWELL. He could not be made the goat unless he uses the funds for that purpose. If he is guilty of using the funds of the corporation for that purpose he should be punished.

Mr. PLATT. The trouble is in putting in too drastic penalties the jury would not enforce them, and very likely the person would get off scot free. I think the penalty is sufficient. I do not think it is necessary to make imprisonment necessary, even though it might be for only a day. Why try to make the law so that it will not be enforced?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, is this to be taken out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWELL. I yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts, but the gentleman from New York took up the time. I want to suggest that a penalty of $5,000 against a corporation of this character and magnitude for conspiring to control prices is no penalty at all.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman notice that this is a penalty on the officers and not on the corporation?

Mr. DOWELL. I understand it is the officer, but it is the officer who controls the funds of this vast corporation.

Mr. PLATT. Not necessarily; he may be the agent or employee.

Mr. DOWELL. It is the officer or agent of this company who has control of the funds for the purpose of fixing prices. I submit that if you merely place a penalty of $5,000 for an offense of this character, where the officer has this immense fund which he may use for the purpose of fixing prices, we are opening wide the door and permitting these officers and agents with impunity to use this vast fund for that purpose. I think we should place a penalty on the offense that will deter officers from attempting to use funds for the purpose of fixing prices. Remember, this bill authorizes a vast corporation, with not less than $2,000,000 of funds—no doubt it will be many millions—and it should be made plain that the officers of this company are not permitted to use that fund for the purpose of fixing prices. We ought to put upon it a penalty commensurate with the offense if that fund is so used.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman think that an organization could fix prices with $2,000,000?

Mr. DOWELL. I think if this clause is to prevent officers from using the funds of the corporation to fix prices, if that is the purpose, there should be put in here a penalty that will prevent the use of funds for that purpose. It seems to me that $5,000 is so small an amount that an officer could with impunity proceed to violate the law. My experience is that when you have a small fine of this character and an officer is convicted of an offense, and he is a man of high standing, he will secure that nominal fine of $5,000 and there will be no further penalty attached. If you want to stop this and prevent the fixing of prices by these companies, adopt this amendment and make it certain that the court will send the offender at least for a time to the penitentiary, and that will have some effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will adopt this amendment. It is only a slight, flimsy protection against the organization of a large trust which will undoubtedly control prices in this country. I think I pointed this out to the committee, and the committee understands my position. If you do not do something toward putting some one in jail, they can afford to pay $5,000 a day out of a combination and let some officer or employee be the goat. There is absolutely no protection against fixing prices by these organizations, as heretofore pointed out, and this would not have been in the bill if the committee of the House had not put it in. That great institution called the Federal Reserve Board brought the bill in without any such protection. It was necessary to put it in by the committee of the House. The provision in the bill would have no effect on an organization taking in millions of dollars; and I hope this amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa will be adopted.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to say, in reply, that with any such violation of the law as referred to by the gentleman from Illinois the charter of the corporation could be forfeited and the Federal Reserve Board has all sorts of control. It is not wise to fix penalties that may be too severe to be enforced. There is no danger of this being attempted except perhaps with some small commodity produced in some country where there was not much of a market for it. Some innocent employee might be charged with the offense, or there might be a charge where there was no merit or a technical charge where there might be some merit when they would not want to impose an imprisonment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOWELL) there were 22 ayes and 26 noes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks for tellers. All those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Nine Members have arisen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer, on page 9, line 6, after the word "fine," to insert the words "not less than $1,000, and," and on line 7, to strike out the word "exceeding" and substitute the words "less than," and in the same line, after the word "year," to insert the words "and not exceeding five years."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment: Page 9, line 6, after the word "fine," insert the words "not less than $1,000, and," and on page 9, line 7, strike out the word "exceeding" and insert in lieu thereof the words "less than," and after the word "year" insert the words "and not exceeding five years."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the right in the committee to offer amendments as I saw fit. So that the Committee of the Whole may understand why I offer this amendment, I call attention to the language that we strike out on page 8.

Mr. PLATT. I will be very glad to accept the first part of the gentleman's amendment, but I think the last part is too severe.

Mr. WINGO. I think that when I get through the gentleman will be willing to accept my amendment. On page 8 the lines stricken out were put in in the Senate and were known as the Gronna amendment. The Gronna amendment does not serve the purpose. What was the purpose? The purpose can be more readily grasped by reading the new language that the House committee inserts, commencing with line 20. We want to confine these institutions to purely financial transactions. We do not want them to use the great power of these corporations to undertake to control the price of these commodities, because the moment they are organized and they enter the field they will have a practical monopoly of foreign financial exchange transactions. If they have a monopoly of foreign financial exchange transactions, then they can come near controlling the price of wheat, corn, cotton, and the surplus manufactured articles we want to ship to Europe. That is the reason why Senator GRONNA offered the Senate amendment, but it had no penalty as it came from the Senate, and all we could do would be to dissolve the corporation. In other words, after these corporations have used the power that they have by controlling the credits to buy up the surplus wheat crop of the United States at a price which they fix, being the only purchaser, they could say to the European customers, "You keep out of the market," like the allied purchasing board said, "You keep out of the market and we will buy your surplus wheat, and we will sell it to you at a certain price." They would be the only ones who would be in the market for the surplus wheat. Therefore the House committee put in this provision that would restrict them, not only forfeiting their charter, but making it a criminal offense for any officer of the corporation to use their funds or their powers in that way. What did the committee do? They put in a provision by which a man might be fined $1, where they could afford to control the surplus wheat of the United States or the surplus cotton of the South. I say, let us impose a fine so that the court could send the offenders to jail for not less than a year and fine them certainly some amount that would be a check upon them.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I accept the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

No corporation shall be organized under the provisions of this section with a capital stock of less than $2,000,000, one-quarter of which must be paid in before the corporation may be authorized to begin business, and the remainder of the capital stock of such corporation shall be paid in installments of at least 10 per cent on the whole amount to which the corporation shall be limited as frequently as one installment at the end of each succeeding two months from the time of the commencement of its banking operations, until the whole of the capital stock shall be paid in. The capital stock of any such corporation may be increased at any time, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, by a vote of two-thirds of its shareholders or by unanimous consent in writing of the shareholders without a meeting and without a formal vote, and may be reduced in like manner, provided that in no event shall it be less than $2,000,000.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 9, line 22, after the word "vote" insert the words "but any such increase of capital shall be fully paid within 90 days after such approval."

Page 10, line 1, after the figures "$2,000,000" add the following: "No corporation, except as herein provided, shall during the time it shall continue its operations, withdraw or permit to be withdrawn, either in the form of dividends or otherwise, any portion of its capital. Any national banking association may invest in the stock of any corporation organized under the provisions of this section, but the aggregate amount of stock held in all corporations engaged in business of the kind described in this section and in section 25 of the Federal reserve act as amended shall not exceed 10 per cent of the subscribing bank's capital and surplus."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Page 9, line 9, at the end of the line insert the words "nor for more than $50,000,000."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is no limitation here upon the amount of capital stock one of these corporations may have. My amendment would limit it to $50,000,000.

Mr. PLATT. If we put it at as low a limit as that, these corporations will not be able to buck the Money Trust at all. The National City Bank has a capital and surplus of more than $80,000,000.

Mr. MORGAN. The National City Bank has a capital of only $25,000,000.

Mr. PLATT. But it has $55,000,000 of surplus. These institutions should be large enough to do business against the competition of the biggest banks.

Mr. MORGAN. What limit would the gentleman place?

Mr. PLATT. None whatever.

Mr. MORGAN. On that issue I stand on the other side.

I do not believe that this Congress should authorize banking corporations with a capital unlimited in amount. I do not stand for that proposition. There is such a thing as monopolizing the credit power of this country. I do not believe that one corporation ought to get so large that it can dominate the credit necessary for the export business of this country, and if you leave these corporations without limit as to capital, one corporation might be organized which would dominate all others. This country does not stand for monopoly in credit nor in anything else. Does the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee stand for that kind of a proposition?

Mr. PLATT. There is one big corporation now——

Mr. MORGAN. If the gentleman does, he is out of harmony with the spirit of the times.

Mr. PLATT. There is one big corporation now, with branches all over the world, and you ought to give these corporations at least a chance to compete with them and not make them so puny that they can not.

Mr. MORGAN. If you have one big corporation now, it will expand to a larger corporation, and there is no limit to its expansion. It may absorb all others. I believe there ought to be a limit put on the amount of capital these corporations may have. If the gentleman thinks $50,000,000 is too small, make it something else. I understand they are preparing to organize a corporation with a billion dollars capital. I am opposed to this. I believe that my amendment to limit the capital to $50,000,000 is fair, just, safe, and wise. Whoever holds the credit power of this country holds a monopoly upon the business interests of this country, and that is the great danger we have to-day. The credit of our country is in the hands of a few great institutions. And so they hold great power over the agricultural interests, the manufacturing interests, and all the other industrial interests of the country. The credit power of the country is now too much centered in the great banks located in our great cities. We should guard against the monopolization of credit. One way to do this is to limit the capitalization of these institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

A majority of the shares of the capital stock of any such corporation shall be held and owned by citizens of the United States, by corporations the controlling interest in which is owned by citizens of the United States, chartered under the laws of the United States or of a State of the United States, or by firms or companies, the controlling interest in which is owned by citizens of the United States. The provisions of section 8 of the act approved October 15, 1914, entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," as amended, shall be construed to apply to the directors, other officers, agents, or employees of corporations organized under the provisions of this section.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

Page 10, line 13, after the word "shall," insert the words "at all times."

Page 10, line 23, after the word "amended," insert the words "by the acts of May 15, 1916, and September 7, 1916."

Page 10, after the word "section," insert the following: "Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall (1) prohibit any director or other officer, agent, or employee of any member bank, who has procured the approval of the Federal Reserve Board from serving at the same time as a director or other officer, agent, or employee of any corporation organized under the provisions of this section in whose capital stock such member bank shall have invested; or (2) prohibit any director or other officer, agent, or employee of any corporation organized under the provisions of this section who has procured the approval of the Federal Reserve Board from serving at the same time as a director or other officer, agent, or employee of any other corporation in whose capital stock such first-mentioned corporation shall have invested under the provisions of this section.

No member of the Federal Reserve Board shall be an officer or director of any corporation organized under the provisions of this section, or of any corporation engaged in similar business organized under the laws of any State, nor hold stock in any such corporation, and before entering upon his duties as a member of the Federal Reserve Board he shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has complied with this requirement."

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman a question or so. I notice that the provisions of the paragraph just read require the capital stock to be owned by citizens of the United States. What provisions are there in the bill, in case the stock should subsequently come into the hands of an alien, to cure the situation?

Mr. PLATT. It simply says a majority of the stock.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Suppose a majority of the stock should subsequently come into the hands of an alien.

Mr. PLATT. Well, the Federal Reserve Board could find that out and forfeit the charter if they had to do so.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Can the charter be forfeited for an act for which the corporation itself is in no way responsible?

Mr. PLATT. Well, I do not know exactly what would happen in that case, but the directors, at least, have to be all citizens of the United States. If aliens were to own a corporation, the Federal Reserve Board could certainly make them sell the stock or——

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. But so far as the act is concerned there is no provision in it which touches that question.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] suggests the corporation can refuse to transfer the stock.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield for one moment?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. As I understand the gentleman asks if there is any remedy if an alien owns stock of the corporation?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I asked if there was any remedy to correct the evil which would occur under the provisions of the act in case a majority of the stock should be held by an alien.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir. If the gentleman will look at the top of page 12, he will see that—

Should any corporation organized hereunder violate or fail to comply with any of the provisions of this section, all of its rights, privileges, and franchises derived herefrom may thereby be forfeited.

And they would proceed to take away their right to do business.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. But the gentleman fails to take into consideration that that is not a violation——

Mr. STEVENSON. But it is a failure to comply with the provisions of the section.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. What section is violated if a majority of the stock comes into the hands of an alien?

Mr. WINGO. Let me offer this suggestion: Before the transfer becomes final and complete it would have to be made upon the books of the corporation. Say I, as an American citizen, offered to sell to you, an alien, shares of stock which have to be transferred upon the books of the corporation——

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Well, now let me say——

Mr. WINGO. Let me give the gentleman a complete illustration and I think it will answer him. If the transfer from the American citizen to the alien would cause the ownership of the stock to fall below a majority in American citizens, it would be the duty of the corporation to refuse to complete the transfer and issue the stock to the transferee who had presented it. There is where in a practical manner that provision would be enforced. It would be a violation of the law for the corporation to permit that transfer, and it would lose its charter if it permitted the transfer.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not answered the question. Suppose aliens held 49 per cent of the stock for which the transfer is made on the books of the corporation. A, who is a citizen of the United States, dies and leaves heirs in England, and A owns 10 per cent of the stock. Nobody has violated any law, and yet the stock is virtually owned, more than 51 per cent, by alien hands, and you can not, under anything that I have discovered in this act, correct that situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to explain the provision and my understanding of it. I understand the gentleman wants to know about the transfer of stock, or relative to that part of it which provides that so much shall always be held by American citizens. Is that what he wishes?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I want the gentleman to understand that I am in favor of the provision, but it is its enforcement that I have reference to.

Mr. PHELAN. I know what the gentleman means. I asked the same question in the committee, and suggested it might be well to have a provision in the act which would provide that stock could not be transferred in excess of the amount laid down in the bill to a foreigner, and I also suggested some other provisions that might pertain.

But it is rather a difficult thing to handle by rigid legislative enforcement, and we finally decided to put the prohibition just as it is there, and the whole thing can be taken care of by regulation of the Federal Reserve Board, to the effect that not more than so much stock can be transferred to persons of foreign birth; and they can also make the regulation providing that if men of foreign birth get stock by inheritance in a way to violate the spirit of this statute that it must be divested and sold. And another way that it can be done is that the whole thing can be provided for in the bill itself. We had our doubts whether to attempt to do it by rigid provision of law or let the Federal Reserve Board take care of it by rigid regulations.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Another question: What is the criticism against providing for that just as the gentleman has suggested—by a provision which would at once transfer the stock when it fell into the hands of an alien?

Mr. PHELAN. Personally I do not know that there is any important objection. I raised the point, and the committee did not see fit to act upon it. But I do not believe there is going to be any harm in leaving it as it is or I would have pressed it.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman supposes that when a man dies his stock would go to the alien, whereas when a man dies, who is a resident of this country, the stock does not go to a foreign country, but it is administered by an executor or an administrator and does not pass to any heirs at law at all. It will be held by the estate and held by the administrator, and can not be passed unless by the usual method of procedure on the books of a corporation.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The gentleman is in error as I understand the law of many States. You only have to sell property to pay debts, and the balance of the property can pass to an heir without being sold.

Mr. STEVENSON. Stocks can.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The suggestion is that inheritance by an alien is through the comity of nations. The right to inherit is mostly a statutory right.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. That is mostly covered by treaties, and that would prevent your doing away with treaties.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I would suggest to the gentleman, in view of that fact, it would seem to me rather clear that the alien would not inherit the stock; but if the alien inherited at all, he inherited the right to dispose of the stock under the laws of the State chartering the corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shareholders in any corporation organized under the provisions of this section shall be liable for the contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporations to the extent of double the amount of their stock holdings. No such corporation shall become a member of any Federal reserve bank.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Line 24, page 11, after the word "the" strike out "contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporations to the extent of double the amount of their stockholdings," and insert "amount of their unpaid stock subscriptions."

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the committee. Everybody has mentioned the Senate to-day, and I do likewise. The Senate put in this provision, and the same provision that is in the national bank act, in regard to the double liability of stockholders.

Somewhat of an extended argument was had, and after a full debate it was decided that the bill which was presented by the Federal Reserve Board—which always looks so carefully after the interests of the people—should be amended by inserting a double liability on the part of the stockholders. The committee now is offering an amendment to strike out that double liability and give these banks a great preference over the national banks and over the State banks of the United States. Now, the question is up to this committee whether it wishes to sweep that aside and go on and grant these national banking concerns that right and that power with single liability only.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman confuses the purposes of this act with the purposes underlying the general banking institutions of the country. The act now under consideration is designed to afford the means of handling long-time credits and securities incident to foreign trade. The corporations to be established are not to engage in the regular business of receiving deposits. They are not to be permitted to accept any deposits whatsoever, except such as may be necessary or incident to the conduct of the general business for which they are created. It is on account of the purpose to protect depositors that the law requires subscribers to the capital stock of banking institutions to assume liability in double the amount of the stock subscribed. No such reason applies in the case of corporations that are not allowed to receive deposits.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Not for a moment. The minimum capital stock of the corporations to be established is fixed at $2,000,000. The act provides that the capital stock shall not be impaired, either by the payment of dividends or in any other manner. The capital stock will furnish ample protection to people with whom they deal. They are not to receive general deposits from the public at large. They are to go out and conduct ordinary business transactions—to bargain, sell, and trade—and people who deal with them will have ample opportunity to know and understand the conditions of the corporations with which they deal, to investigate and find out what they are getting and to know what they are trading for. This is very different from banking institutions holding themselves out to the public as such under the sanction and regulations of law and inviting the public to deposit funds with them. In the case of regular banks the public is entitled to rely upon the regulations of law and the system of examination and inspection, as well as the double liability of stockholders, for protection.

Again, in this bill we specifically authorize all national banks to subscribe to the capital stock of the corporations to be established. It is not practicable to impose double liability upon banks who are allowed to become subscribers to the capital stock of other corporations. It is unlike such a provision when applied to individuals. It is not desirable that the element of uncertainty and indefinite risk shall be carried into the operation of the banks of the country by placing upon them a contingent liability beyond the amount of stock to be subscribed by them. It would be better to raise the minimum of the capital stock with which the institutions to be established shall be permitted to operate than to undertake to afford larger protection by means of double liability imposed upon the regular banks.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Why is such a provision put in the national bank act?

Mr. STEAGALL. I have just been undertaking to show why the provision has been placed in the national bank act and to point out wherein this system is contradistinguished from the regular banking system which is engaged in the business of receiving deposits.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe——

Mr. STEAGALL. The deposits in banks are frequently fifty times the amount of their capital stock and they are held out to the public as safe institutions where deposits may be made under the protection of Government supervision and safeguards. The individual who deposits his money in a regular banking institution has no opportunity to examine into the nature of the security and protection back of his deposit. But when a man trades with the institutions to be established under this act he has every opportunity to make thorough investigation, to have all the cards on the table, and know what he is doing. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is necessary to add anything to what my colleague from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] has said. The national banks are authorized to subscribe not to exceed 10 per cent of their capital to these institutions. Now, if you double the liability you will make them subscribe 20 per cent. No bank would be willing to go into an institution of this kind and have a double liability upon it, and there is no necessity for having a double liability upon it, because there is no business sale of deposit credit over the counter, as in the case with national banks. Every debenture they get out will doubtless have a list of the securities that stand back of it, so that the people will know what is back of them. The double liability does not apply to the savings banks or to cooperative investment institutions. It applies only to the national banks that take deposits from people who can not know what is the nature of the business the banks are doing.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. BENSON. If you remove this provision you would put an extra liability on the national banks. It would injure the depositors of the national banks if anything hurt this bank.

Mr. PLATT. Yes. That is true; and I thank the gentleman for calling attention to that fact.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that there is a provision in the act that permits national and State banks to convert themselves into international banks under the provisions of this act. If they do so, I ask the membership of this House what becomes of the double liability? Will there be any more national banks organized? Why not organize under this act under the provisions made for it?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the committee has considered the possible danger of great favoritism being shown in international commerce by these institutions to a concern which is more or less associated with them or in which the institution has an especial interest? I do not profess to have analyzed this bill very closely, but this I have in mind: If this sort of an institution and its activities are necessary for the proper conduct of international business, then any concern on this side against which the management has some grudge, or if the concern has a competitor in which the management of the institution is specially interested, by extending favors to the one in whom they are specially interested and denying accommodation to the other concern, they could destroy a concern undertaking to engage in foreign business? I propound that question. I apologize to the gentleman for having asked a question without careful analysis of the bill, but it occurs to me that there is such a danger involved in the situation.

Mr. PLATT. I think there is no such danger. Of course, institutions could favor a national bank as a stockholder by keeping the deposits in that bank, and I think they naturally would.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman does not understand my question. I think it is important enough to draw attention to——

Mr. PLATT. There will be plenty of large competitors in these institutions, national and State banks and other great national corporations.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The chairman, I think, does not quite understand me. Suppose, for instance, there are operating in a given community two steel mills. One of these steel mills is tied up rather intimately with an institution of this sort, serving this territory. Could not this institution serving that territory, by extending its facilities to one and denying them to the other, put the discriminated against mill out of business?

Mr. PLATT. I will say in answer to that that the gentleman is talking about ordinary deposit banks. These institutions would not be discounting paper for anybody to any extent.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think I am unfortunate this afternoon, and I will speak to the chairman privately. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. I see what the gentleman is trying to get at.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Should any corporation organized hereunder fail to comply with any of the provisions of the laws of the United States, all of its rights, privileges, and franchises derived herefrom may thereby be forfeited. Before any such corporation shall be declared dissolved, or its rights, privileges, and franchises forfeited, any noncompliance with or violation of such laws shall, however, be determined and adjudged by a court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in a suit brought for that purpose in the district or territory in which the home office of such corporation is located, which suit shall be brought by the United States at the instance of the Federal Reserve Board or the Attorney General. Upon adjudication of such noncompliance or violation each director and officer who participated in or assented to the illegal act or acts shall be liable in his personal or individual capacity for all damages which the said corporation shall have sustained in consequence thereof. No dissolution shall take away or impair any remedy against the corporation, its stockholders, or officers for any liability or penalty previously incurred.

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 12, line 4, insert after the word "hereunder" the words "violate or."

Page 12, line 6, strike out the words "the laws of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof the words "this section."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the Federal Reserve Board shall become satisfied of the insolvency of any such corporation it may appoint a receiver, who shall take possession of all of the property and assets of the corporation and exercise the same rights, privileges, powers, and authority with respect thereto as are now exercised by receivers of national banks appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States: Provided, however, That the assets of the corporation subject to the laws of other countries or jurisdictions shall be dealt with in accordance with the terms of such laws.

Every corporation organized under the provisions of this section shall hold a meeting of its stockholders annually upon a date fixed in its by-laws, such meeting to be held at its home office in the United States. Every such corporation shall keep at its home office books containing the names of all stockholders thereof and the names and addresses of the members of its board of directors, together with copies of all reports made by it to the Federal Reserve Board. Every such corporation shall make reports to the Federal Reserve Board at such times and in such form as it may require; and shall be subject to examinations whenever deemed necessary by the Federal Reserve Board by examiners appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, the cost of such examinations, including the compensation of the examiners, to be fixed by the Federal Reserve Board and to be paid by the corporation examined.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is provided that the Federal Reserve Board shall appoint receivers when satisfied of the insolvency of any corporation created under the provisions of this law. Have they any right under existing law to appoint receivers for Federal reserve banks?

Mr. PLATT. I think so, but not for any other banks. These things come under the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. WALSH. Why did the committee put this provision in the bill?

Mr. PLATT. It has not brought the comptroller's office into this law at all; it is wholly under the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think the financial functions which these institutions will perform are of such a character as to require strict supervision of the Federal Reserve Board, so that it will be in a position to pass upon questions of insolvency of property without long examinations?

Mr. PLATT. I think so. This act is tied up with the Federal Reserve Board all through—perhaps too much so—and as some of these institutions are to be built up without great American experience it is impossible to prescribe just what should be done, and so we have given the board pretty broad powers. I think they would know almost immediately if an institution was in a shaky condition.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 13, line 21, after the word "to," strike out "examinations whenever" and insert in lieu thereof "examinations once a year and at such other times as may be prescribed."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Committee amendment: Page 14, line 3, insert:

"The directors of any corporation organized under the provisions of this section may, semiannually, declare a dividend of so much of the net profits of the corporation as they shall judge expedient; but each corporation shall, before the declaration of a dividend, carry one-tenth of its net profits of the preceding half year to its surplus fund until the same shall amount to 20 per cent of its capital stock."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I understand that under the Federal reserve act the expenses of the Federal Reserve Board are apportioned to the member banks outside. Would these corporations pay any part of the expense of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington?

Mr. PLATT. We have provided that the expenses of examination, and so forth, shall be assessed on the banks or institutions examined.

Mr. MORGAN. The Federal reserve banks pay all the expenses and salaries of the Federal Reserve Board under the Federal reserve act. Now, would these corporations pay a part of that expense?

Mr. PLATT. These corporations are not a part of the Federal Reserve System. They are simply supervised by the Federal Reserve Board. They are not allowed to rediscount by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that. Then your idea would be that they would not pay any portion of the salaries or expenses of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. PLATT. Except as they might contribute to the prosperity of the national banks.

Mr. MORGAN. I think they should be made to contribute toward paying the expense of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, is this conversation going into the RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. WALSH. If it is going into the RECORD, we can read it in the morning. Otherwise gentlemen ought to speak loudly enough so that they can be heard.

Mr. MORGAN. We have finished what we were saying. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Every banking corporation authorized to do foreign banking business under the provisions of this section shall, for the purpose of taxation, make reports to the Federal Reserve Board and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at such times and in such form as they may require, including a true report of the names of the actual stockholders of such corporations; and the amount of stock held by each and all such corporations organized and transacting business under the provisions of this section shall be taxed the same as member banks of the Federal Reserve System.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 14, strike out all of lines 10 to 19, inclusive, and insert the following:

"Any corporation organized under the provisions of this section shall be subject to tax by the State within which its home office is located in the same manner and to the same extent as other corporations organized under the laws of that State which are transacting a similar character of business. The shares of stock in such corporation shall also be subject to tax as the personal property of the owners or holders thereof in the same manner and to the same extent as the shares of stock in similar State corporations: Provided, however, That such shares owned by nonresidents of any State shall be taxed only in the city or town in which the corporation's home office is located, and not elsewhere.

"Any corporation organized under the provisions of this section may at any time within the two years next previous to the date of the expiration of its corporate existence, by a vote of the shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, apply to the Federal Reserve Board for its approval to extend the period of its corporate existence for a term of not more than 20 years, and upon certified approval of the Federal Reserve Board such corporation shall have its corporate existence for such extended period unless sooner dissolved by the act of the shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, or by an act of Congress or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law.

"Any bank or banking institution incorporated by special law of any State or of the United States or organized under the general laws of any State or of the United States, and having an unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a corporation under the provisions of this section, may, by the vote of the shareholders owning not less than two-thirds of the capital stock of such bank or banking association, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, be converted into a Federal corporation of the kind authorized by this section with any name approved by the Federal Reserve Board: Provided, however, That said conversion shall not be in contravention of the State law. In such case the articles of association and organization certificate may be executed by a majority of the directors of the bank or banking institution, and the certificate shall declare that the owners of at least two-thirds of the capital stock have authorized the directors to make such certificate and to change or convert the bank or banking institution into a Federal corporation. A majority of the directors, after executing the articles of association and the organization certificate, shall have power to execute all other papers and to do whatever may be required to make its organization perfect and complete as a Federal corporation. The shares of any such corporation may continue to be for the same amount each as they were before the conversion, and the directors may continue to be directors of the corporation until others are elected or appointed in accordance with the provisions of this section. When the Federal Reserve Board has given to such corporation a certificate that the provisions of this section have been complied with, such corporation and all its stockholders, officers, and employees shall have the same powers and privileges and shall be subject to the same duties, liabilities, and regulations in all respects as shall have been prescribed by this section for corporations originally organized hereunder.

"Every officer, director, clerk, employee, or agent of any corporation organized under this section who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, credits, securities, evidences of indebtedness, or assets of any character of such corporation; or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts forth any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, assigns any note, bond, debenture, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree; or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of such corporation with intent in either case to injure or defraud such corporation, or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of such corporation, the Federal Reserve Board, or any agent or examiner appointed to examine the affairs of any such corporation; and every receiver of any such corporation, and every clerk or employee of such receiver who shall embezzle, abstract, or willfully misapply or wrongfully convert to his own use any moneys, funds, credits, or assets of any character which may come into his possession or under his control in the execution of his trust or the performance of the duties of his employment; and every such receiver or clerk or employee of such receiver who shall, with intent to injure or defraud any person, body politic or corporate, or to deceive or mislead the Federal Reserve Board, or any agent or examiner appointed to examine the affairs of such receiver, shall make any false entry in any book, report, or record of any matter connected with the duties of such receiver; and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, director, clerk, employee, or agent of any corporation organized under this section, or receiver or clerk or employee of such receiver as aforesaid, in any violation of this section, shall upon conviction thereof be imprisoned for not less than 2 years nor more than 10 years, and may also be fined not more than $5,000, in the discretion of the court."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY to the committee amendment: On page 15, line 4, after the word "however," strike out all down to and including line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That such shares owned by shareholders or corporations who are nonresidents of the State in which the home office of such corporation is located shall be taxed only in the State or States in which such stockholders respectively reside, or in which such shareholding corporations respectively have their principal places of business, and not elsewhere."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, the committee amendment would make both the corporation as well as the shares of stock taxable, but it would make the shares of stock taxable only in the State in which the corporation had its home office. Now, if you are to tax both the corporation and its shares of stock, and I agree to that view, it seems to me it is but fair and just that the shareholders be required to pay the taxes on their individual certificates of stock in the States in which those stockholders respectively reside. In the case of a corporation which owns stock in this corporation, the shares of stock which are the property of the shareholding corporation should be taxed in the State in which the subsidiary or shareholding corporation has its office or principal place of business. Shares of stock, as I understand it, under all of the States are construed to be, of course, personal property. The situs of personal property is supposed to follow its owner. In other words, the situs of that property is the domicile or residence of the owner, just as in the case of notes and bonds and mortgages and other personal property. So, if you are to tax the individual shares of stock, each State in which shareholders reside ought to have the right to impose upon its citizens taxes on those shares of stock. If you do not do that, you will permit the great centers in which these international banking corporations are located to tax the property of citizens of your State who may hold shares of stock in those concerns and deny to your State the right to tax them. New York, Boston, Baltimore, Galveston, New Orleans, and the ports of the country at which are located these international corporations organized to do a foreign business will be permitted to tax the individual and private property of the citizens throughout the United States who happen to reside within the respective States. It seems to me it is fair and just to the several States to permit them to tax the property of their citizens or corporations residing in the respective States; and the purpose of this amendment——

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Suppose a national bank in Charleston, S. C., takes stock in one of these corporations. It holds that stock as an investment. It is taxed merely on its capital stock. South Carolina does not tax it on the sum of its investments, but on its capital stock. That stock which the national bank holds in Charleston would be classed as choses in action and would not be taxed at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not an expert on banking like the members of this committee and do not pretend to be, but I can read the English language, and if this committee amendment means anything it means that you are going to allow the States in which the home offices of these corporations are located not only to tax the corporation itself but to tax the individual property, the personal property, of the stockholders of these corporations, no matter whether they reside in South Carolina, in Indiana, in Illinois, or anywhere else, and I am trying to draft some amendment that will remedy that evil and secure to the States their right to tax the property of their own citizens whose legal status is within such States.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. What is the effect when measured by constitutional provision of the right of Congress to transfer the taxable property of the gentleman to the State of Louisiana, as this would do?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not prepared to answer that in the light of judicial decisions, but it seems to me——

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will answer. They will do just as they do with national banks. They assess it against the banks, and the banks get it from the stockholders.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] that this is not a parallel case to national banks. Most of the national banks are organized for the purpose of doing a more or less local business within their respective communities, and there is not as much injustice in those cases of permitting the State or the county in which the bank happens to be located to assess it exclusively, but in this case the corporations are supposed to be doing business for the whole United States, and I do not think it fair to permit the city and State in which they are domiciled to levy taxes on all the personal property, consisting of shares of stock, and deny such right to the States in which the owners reside.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, possibly the older Members of Congress remember that this question of taxing shares of banks has been considered by Congress before. I suggest to my friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that if he will examine the decisions he will find that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the shares of stock constitute a separate piece of property subject to taxation, and that an individual who holds shares of stock in a bank is properly required to list those shares of stock as a part of his personal estate, even though the bank may be taxed on its assets.

I have always thought, and I thought so in the committee, that this provision on page 15, that they should be taxed in the State or county in which the corporation's home office is located is not right; but here is what the committee did in writing the taxing feature of this bill: The Supreme Court of the United States and the different courts have interpreted this language. It is copied verbatim from the national banking act. In other words, we are going to make these corporations and their stock to be taxed exactly in the same manner as national banks and their stock are taxed. We thought that would save a great deal of controversy. That provision of law has been thrashed out in the courts of the country. It is well understood by lawyers and by the public who render their statements for the purposes of taxation. I have never yet found any answer, I may say, to the argument that the shares of stock should be taxed and assessed at the domicile of the person owning them, but Congress has thrashed that matter out several times and has insisted, and the law is now as we have brought it forward in this amendment.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. What objection would the gentleman have to applying the same rule that applies to all corporate stocks, the stock of State banks, of oil corporations, promissory notes, and everything else

Mr. WINGO. That is exactly what Congress has done. We have copied the existing law.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Is it not a fact that in most of the States the stock in State banks and in corporations is required to be listed by the owner nonresident?

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will go into that he will find it one of the most interesting investigations he ever undertook. He will find that in some places lawyers make the contention, and get away with it, and the States do not tax the shares of stock separately, notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has said they are subject to taxation; but it is a lamentable fact that very few shares of stock are taxed in the States because they run a bluff on the tax assessor and say, "The national bank renders our stock for taxation."

The bank deducts in some States, because they say the provision requires them to collect the taxes on your shares of stock, and the stockholders are paying the taxes where they collect from the stockholders, whereas in other States it requires them to assess on the capital stock and not the assets, and you will find there is a conflict both of practice and decision in the different courts with reference to it, but the decision of the Supreme Court is uniformly plain on this subject.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. CANNON. In Illinois and Indiana, especially in Illinois, while the real estate is taxed one-third of its value, and most all other property, the banks are taxed at par on their stock, capital, and surplus.

Mr. WINGO. Most of the States do this, I imagine, I will say this to the gentleman from Illinois. They have a 50 per cent assessment in my State. They permit the banks to take the value of their capital stock that is invested in real estate, and they will divide that, cut it in two, for the purpose of assessing their real estate, because they have the 50 per cent rule and are entitled to that reduction. Is not that the rule in Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. You pay on the real estate, the banking house—that is, the real estate—you pay as all other real estate is taxed.

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It is taxed about one-third of the value of the bank stock and all other property, and it is assessed on the capital, surplus, and undivided profit at par.

Mr. WINGO. Well, I will suggest to the gentleman from Illinois if he will observe the statutes, he will find they are permitted to deduct from the capital stock and accumulated surplus the value of the real estate and assess separately the real estate.

Mr. CANNON. They tax it separately, just as you do a farm——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The motion is not in order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CONNALLY) there were—ayes 16, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. DOWELL. On this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 11, after the word "not," strike out the words "less than two years nor."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is this: On page 9 it is provided that if the officers or directors of these corporations combine for the purpose of fixing prices and increasing prices the maximum jail sentence shall be one year, and this provision is to the effect that if a clerk embezzles $100 the minimum jail sentence—if the language of the committee amendment is used—is two years, or twice the maximum that would be imposed upon an officer of a corporation for the offense of raising prices. The purpose of my amendment is to make the penalty a little more consistent than it would be if this provision were adopted.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Would it not have been more consistent if the gentleman had voted for the amendment I offered awhile ago to increase the penalty for the other offense?

Mr. BARBOUR. Possibly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BARBOUR) there were—ayes 26, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of Nebraska: Page 15, lines 4 and 5, strike out "any State" and insert in lieu thereof "the United States."

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if I have understood the excuse that has been made for this proviso on page 15, it is that States do not by their laws collect taxes on stocks, and therefore the committee felt justified in this bill to, in effect, provide that by selling the stock in the State of Iowa or the State of Texas, and taking the money to New York and using it, they acquired the right to not only have the use of the money there but to tax it in New York and deprive the States of Iowa and Texas of that money, and their right to tax it. The excuse for doing that is that some of the States do not collect taxes on stocks. As I understand it, that is no reason why New York should have the right to tax that money, and if another State does have a proper law, and if Texas can collect the taxes on that stock, she has the right to collect them. Now, the purpose of the amendment I have submitted is only this: Simply to permit the collection of taxes on stock owned by nonresidents of the United States in the place or domicile of the corporation, but to permit each State of the United States in its individual capacity to collect the tax on the stocks owned in the respective States. I think that is only fair, and it is not an excuse to say that some of the States will not take advantage of the privilege which they have, and so lose their taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, if all the amendments are in, I desire to offer an amendment in the way of a new section.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. To the committee amendment?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 15, line 3, after the colon, strike out the word "Provided," and all of lines 4, 5, and 6.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, if my amendment should be adopted, the following language would be stricken out of the bill:

Provided, however, That such shares owned by nonresidents of any State shall be taxed only in the city or town in which the corporation's home office is located, and not elsewhere.

This bill provides that the assets of the corporations which are to be organized hereunder shall be taxable in the State where they are domiciled, just as assets of any other corporation are taxable. And it goes further and provides that their shares of stock, as distinguished from the general assets, shall be deemed personal property and shall be subject to tax as personal property. Now, that is the rule in many States, and there is no objection to it when properly applied, but if we retain the language of the committee amendment, what situation do we have? We have a declaration in the law that the certificate of stock is personal property, but that it shall be taxed, not where the owner resides, if he is a nonresident of the State, but where the domicile of the bank is situated. Thus, you would have a law which permits a State like New York to tax personal property in the State of Texas, because if I owned stock in one of these banks, that stock is my personal property, and the situs of that stock is where I live. Of course, it is within the power of Congress to give these shares of stock a special situs, but I doubt the wisdom of doing so. It does not seem proper to me for the Congress of the United States to authorize the municipality of New York City to tax personal property which a citizen owns and has in the State of Texas. I submit that as far as we ought to go is to say that all the assets of these corporations shall be taxable in the city and State of their domicile, just the same as any other corporation, and also to permit the State or municipality to tax the shares of stock of citizens residing within its own borders but not the shares of stock which belong to nonresidents of the State.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman's amendment is to strike out the proviso?

Mr. BLACK. Absolutely. That is the purpose of the amendment, to strike out the language which I read a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLACK. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. KING. To offer an amendment in the way of a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KING: Page 18, at the end of line 13, add a new section, as follows:

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman means a new paragraph, does he not?

Mr. KING. A new section.

Mr. WINGO. This is all one section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. The right to modify, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I submit that in the form of a paragraph.

I have no doubt, as this is the only amendment I have offered to-day, that it will be adopted. Of course, the House understands, if it is not adopted, these charters have the same status as Dartmouth College had and are virtually perpetual, and the control will be taken entirely out of Congress.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman reflects a moment he will realize that this whole act amends section 25 of the Federal reserve act, and in that Federal reserve act the right is expressly reserved to modify, amend, or repeal. It is all there.

Mr. KING. They are to issue charters to corporations under this section. That has not been done before. This is virtually a separate act. The reason for bringing it in here in this form was to make it a part of the national banking act. These charters ought not to be endowed with immortality. You have given them everything else.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KING. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 13, after the period insert: "Whoever, being connected in any capacity with any corporation organized under this section, represents in any way that the United States is liable for the payment of any bond or other obligation or the interest thereon issued or incurred by any corporation organized hereunder, or that the United States incurs any liability in respect of any act or omission of the corporation, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 and by imprisonment of not more than five years."

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose is apparent. I shall not take any time for discussion

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is necessary, but I will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may correct the bill by putting quotation marks in several places where they have been omitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. By the rule the previous question is already ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays. Pending that, I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] that inasmuch as the previous question is ordered, they will get a vote to-morrow morning. Perhaps the gentleman from Wyoming would want to move that the House should meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of no quorum.

Mr. WINGO. I am perfectly willing to have the vote to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the point for a moment.

Mr. WINGO. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 200, nays 21, answered "present" 4, not voting 207, as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. BACHARACH (for) with Mr. CRAGO (against).

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer "present." I was not here when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets to say that the gentleman can not be recorded.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote "no." I was not here when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. This is not a roll call with the point of no quorum, and under the rules the gentleman can not vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on the bill may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all who have spoken on the bill may have leave to extend remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will fix a time, say, three legislative days——

Mr. PLATT. I will make it three legislative days.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object further, will the gentleman require it to be confined to the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; that is understood.

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman make it three legislative days confined to the subject matter of the bill, and that no newspaper clippings or other matters be included.

Mr. PLATT. I am willing to adopt that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 241. Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919.

ELECTION IN THE FIFTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF MISSOURI.

Mr. DALLINGER, by direction of Election Committee No. 1, submitted a report on the memorial of Albert L. Reeves, praying for an investigation into the conduct of the election for Congress in the fifth congressional district of Missouri, which was ordered printed.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I may address the House for 15 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. On what subject?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on a bill pending before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee providing for the improvement of the facilities of the service of the War Risk Bureau, a bill that I introduced.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman intends to use his own remarks, with no newspaper clippings?

Mr. WASON. None whatever.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I would like to know when the report of Committee on Elections No. 1 on the Berger case will be in order before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it can not be taken up before November 10. It will be in order any time after to-morrow.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, what is it that the House will take up to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. To consider House bill 10374, the merchant-marine bill.

Mr. WINGO. And the gentleman wants to meet at 11 o'clock for the purpose of expediting that bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, when may we expect to take up the Berger case?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that can not be definitely determined now. It depends on when the railroad bill comes in. If the railroad bill is delayed, I think that bill might come in before the railroad bill. We hope, however, that the railroad bill will be reported.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman think it possible that the railroad proposition will go over to December?

Mr. MONDELL. That will depend on the action of the House. My own thought was that it would be disposed of.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman will remember that before the committees were appointed the majority appointed a committee to look into this matter, and it has been given all this time, and I think it ought to be disposed of.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CALDWELL. Why not dispose of it to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. Because we hope to take up other matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, November 8, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DALLINGER, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, to which was referred the investigation of the election in the fifth Missouri district, submitted a report thereon (No. 449), which said report was referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. RHODES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2709) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to school district No. 8, Sheridan County, Mont., for block 1, in Wakea town site, Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., and to set aside one block in each town site on said reservation for school purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 445), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. EDMONDS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2257) for the relief of George B. Hughes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 446), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GLYNN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10317) for the relief of Blanche Utley, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 447), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. EDMONDS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8647) for the relief of the owners of the American schooner William H. Sumner, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 448), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HULINGS: A bill (H. R. 10430) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the borough of Sharpsville, county of Mercer, State of Pennsylvania, one German cannon or field-piece, to be placed in public park at Sharpsville, Pa.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As in legislative session, the Chair lays before the Senate a certified copy of the resolution of the Legislature of the State of California ratifying the woman suffrage amendment, which will be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERNALD. I have received a communication from T. F. Spear, of the Oxford Paper Co., of Rumford, Me., inclosing a copy of a resolution adopted by the Technical Association of the Pulp and Paper Industry at its meeting held in Chicago September 24–27, 1919. I ask that the communication and accompanying resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the communication and accompanying resolution were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RUMFORD, ME., November 6, 1919.

Senator BERT FERNALD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing a copy of the resolution adopted by the Technical Association of the Pulp and Paper Industry at its fall meeting in Chicago September 24 to 27, 1919.

Members of the association have been urged to bring this resolution to the attention of the Senators and Representatives from their respective districts.

The resolution explains itself quite well. In representing, as you do, a section of the country in which manufacturing of paper and the use of wood are so important, I have no doubt that you will see the advisability of supplying this appropriation asked for, when it will be of such value to our manufacturing interest.

Yours, very truly,

OXFORD PAPER CO.,
By T. F. SPEAR.

Resolution adopted by the Technical Association of the Pulp and Paper Industry at the fall meeting held in Chicago September 24–27, 1919.

Whereas, due to the decay of pulp wood and wood pulp, the paper industry is suffering an annual loss of $5,000,000; and

Whereas, in order to reduce this loss to a minimum, a scientific investigation of the cause and possible control of such infection is essential; and

Whereas the Forest Products Laboratory, United States Department of Agriculture, Madison, Wis., is in an exceptional position to undertake this special investigation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this association use every means within its power to secure a specific appropriation of $50,000 for this special investigation, to be conducted by the Forest Products Laboratory, United States Department of Agriculture, Madison, Wis.

Members of the association are urged to write to Senators and Representatives from their districts urging the immediate need of the proposed investigation and asking favorable consideration for a bill to provide money for the purpose.

THOMAS J. KEENAN, Secretary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Bay City, Mich., remonstrating against the attitude taken by the labor unions in the matter of strikes and the observance of law and order and praying for Federal action to remedy existing conditions, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of S. D. Haight Post, No. 348, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Scottville, Mich., praying for an increase in the pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Jackson, Mich., praying for universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Upper Peninsula Educational Association of Michigan, praying for the establishment of a Department of Education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Gregory, Mich., praying that the United States protect the Armenians from the depredations of the Turks and Kurds and render assistance to them in their efforts to establish an independent government, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Bangor, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation to end the strike of coal miners and approving the action of the administration in relation thereto, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

STRIKE OF WORKERS IN STEEL.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present the report of the committee which has been engaged in the investigation of the steel strike. I wish to say in presenting it that the report is signed by the members of the subcommittee. The balance of the committee did not have the time to go over the testimony or to go over the report. They neither acquiesce in the report presented nor dissent from it, but authorize its presentation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report (No. 289) will be printed under the rule.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3245) to regulate the marriage of persons in the military and naval forces of the United States in foreign countries, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 295); and

A bill (H. R. 9112) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan Army rifles to posts of the American Legion (Rept. No. 296).

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3384) to provide for burial and expenses of transportation of remains of certain officers and enlisted men of the reserve forces of the United States (Rept. No. 290);

A bill (S. 3385) to authorize the War Department to restore the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park to its condition prior to use for military purposes during the war with Germany, and to appropriate the necessary funds therefor (Rept. No. 291);

A bill (S. 3386) to provide for the assistance of civilian aviators in distress by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at cost price at aviation posts or stations gasoline, oil, and aircraft supplies to persons in charge of civilian aircraft landing upon or near said posts (Rept. No. 292);

A bill (S. 3270) authorizing the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine claims for damages occasioned by acts for which said survey is responsible in certain cases (Rept. No. 298); and

A bill (H. R. 3620) to authorize the Commissioner of Navigation to change the names of vessels (Rept. No. 299).

Mr. KIRBY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1216) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States," approved August 27, 1888, as amended March 2, 1889, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 300) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 3395) to discontinue the improvement to provide a channel extending from the sea to the Charleston Navy Yard; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3396) to discontinue the construction of a dry dock at the navy yard, Charleston, S. C.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. PHIPPS:

A bill (S. 3397) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint certain persons in the Regular Army and place them upon the retired list (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KEYES:

A bill (S. 3398) making an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stats., 961), entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3399) authorizing the use of radio stations under the control of the Navy Department for commercial purposes, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HITCHCOCK:

A bill (S. 3400) to amend section 12 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act; and

A bill (S. 3401) to amend sections 12 and 16 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 3402) granting a pension to Ellen Burdick; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 3403) to advance certain officers on the retired list of the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 3404) granting an increase of pension to Joel M. Thomson; and

A bill (S. 3405) granting an increase of pension to Edward H. Bennett; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) granting a bonus to enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts who have accepted or may accept their discharge in order to reenlist in said Philippine Scouts; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM O. JENKINS.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 224), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and hereby is, requested, if not incompatible with the pubic interest, to report to the Senate all information in his possession with respect to the recent forcible abduction of William O. Jenkins, consular agent of the United States at Puebla, Mexico, the indignities suffered by him during such abduction at the hands of Mexican nationals, and the means employed by said Jenkins to effectuate his liberation, together with the representations that have been made to the Mexican Government for the purposes of obtaining indemnification and reparation in the premises and to secure that degree of protection for official representatives of the United States in Mexico that is accorded by civilized States to the diplomatic representatives of other powers, according to the usages and customs of international law and practice.

DISTRIBUTION OF WAR DEPARTMENT SUPPLIES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent as in legislative session to submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities and other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes.

The report was read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities and other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to sell at 15 per cent of their cost to trade, technical, and public schools and universities and other recognized educational institutions, upon application in writing, such machine tools as are suitable for their use which are now owned by the United States of America and are under the control of the War Department and are not needed for Government purposes. The money realized from the sale may be used by the Secretary of War to defray expenses, except cost of transportation, incident to distribution of the tools, and the balance shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That in the event any such material is offered for sale by said institutions without the consent in writing of the Secretary of War, title thereto shall revert to the United States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JULIUS KAHN,
CHAS. POPE CALDWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say in presenting the report that the bill has to do with the sale of machine tools to educational institutions? The House passed a bill for that purpose and the Senate amended it. The views of the two Houses were very much alike, and the conference report merely adjusts two or three little matters in the legislation in a manner satisfactory to both Houses. There is no substantial change in the measure as now agreed to in conference compared with the measure originally passed by the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on October 22, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 9. An act to encourage the reclamation of certain arid lands in the State of Nevada, and for other purposes; and

S. 253. An act for the payment of claims for loss of private property on account of the loss of firearms and ammunition taken by the United States troops during the labor strikes in the State of Colorado in 1914.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

Bills and joint resolution of the following numbers and titles, having been presented to the President of the United States for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, have become laws without his approval:

Presented to the President October 1, 1919:

S. 2910. An act to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee," approved April 5, 1916.

Presented to the President October 10, 1919:

S. 2100. An act authorizing the Union Pacific Railroad Co., or its successors, to convey for public-road purposes certain parts of its right of way.

Presented to the President October 14, 1919:

S. J. Res. 90. Joint resolution to readmit Frances Scoville-Mumm to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States; and

S. 633. An act extending the provisions for the regulation of steam vessels to vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, and for other purposes.

Presented to the President October 20, 1919:

S. 55. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust disputes or claims by entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States against the United States and between each other arising from faulty surveys in townships 29 south, range 28 east; also in townships 36, 37, and 38 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, in the State of Florida, and for other purposes; and

S. 794. An act granting lands for school purposes in Government town sites on reclamation projects.

INTERNATIONAL EXCHANGE.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Brussels, Belgium, in regard to international exchange and comments thereon.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRUSSELS, October 9, 1919.

Honorable Senator OWEN,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Knowing you to be one of the few representatives of the American Nation who are taking the trouble to carefully study the question of foreign exchange, its evils and remedies, I am taking the liberty to communicate with you in the interests of justice, fairness, the rehabilitation of Belgium, and of American export trade.

I had the honor and pleasure of meeting you in New York during the year 1915, through my friend Mr. Kidder.

Every principle which first led Belgium to resist the aggression of Germany and afterwards led the United States into the conflict and for which the Allies fought and the great mass of our own people made sacrifices and gave liberally of their wealth, strength, and the blood of their kindred on the battle fields, and every effort up to the final victory and the peace and birth of the league of nations are each, all, and every one of them being set at naught and their value and fruits nullified by the action of the ghouls of finance who are manipulating foreign exchange in such a way as to strangle the rehabilitation of Belgium, impose hardships greater than during the Hun occupation, killing the American export trade, and turning our faithful ally away from us to force her back into the arms of the Huns who despoiled and outraged her, and are exacting a more outrageous and high-handed tribute, without producing or giving anything in return, than has ever been exacted by the most notorious and infamous Corsair that ever sailed the seas as a pirate.

The ghouls who prowl among the ruins of a fire or earthquake stricken city are of a lower strata of society, who take their lives in their hands and risk being shot by soldiers or police to gain what they can slink away with in their pockets or on their backs.

The ghouls who are now preying on stricken nations and the vampires who are sucking the blood remaining after nearly five years of war and horror, and every drop of which is needed to restore the nations and get the world moving right again, run no risk, carry on their nefarious work unmolested under the full protection of the law, transport their loot through the agencies of government postal service, the strong boxes of the transatlantic ships and railways, and store it in treasure vaults protected by the forces of law and order of the nations.

The wealth, credit, and solvency of any nation or people are based on their agricultural, natural, industrial, and productive resources, their railways, canals, highways, and constructed values and utilities.

What is happening in Belgium and France to-day as a result of foreign-exchange manipulation?

They are borrowing dollars from the United States which only have a purchasing value of 40 cents when they undertake to purchase machinery, materials, or food from the United States.

The American machinery builder, manufacturer, or food producer does not profit to the fraction of a penny out of the 60 per cent excess dollar value the Belgian buyer has to pay.

Who does get it?

If the Belgian wishes to export his goods or products to the United States he finds that his 1 franc value of material or labor is worth only 40 centimes.

Does the American consumer of those goods profit by that 60 per cent reduction of material and labor values?

Who does?

By reducing by 60 per cent the purchasing value of the dollar borrowed by the Belgian and by diminishing by 60 per cent his franc purchasing value and his franc value of material and labor, the American machinery builder, manufacturer, and food producer is losing over 80 per cent of the volume of trade, profit, and employment of American labor that Belgium or France could otherwise give.

Let us suppose that an American manufacturer has goods to sell, the fixed selling price of which is $1,000, and that Belgian exchange is at its normal rate of francs 5.20 to the dollar.

In that case the Belgian customer pays francs 5.20 for the goods.

Let us suppose that the American manufacturer still has the fixed selling price of $1,000, but that Belgian exchange is francs 8.50 to the dollar.

In this case the Belgian customer has to pay 8,500 francs for goods worth 5,200 francs, an increase of 3,300 francs, or over 63 per cent, but which 63 per cent increase in cost to the Belgian customer does not add one penny to the selling price in dollars or to the profits of the American manufacturer.

INTO WHOSE POCKET DOES IT GO?

It is really only giving the Belgian customer 37 cents value for a dollar, and for which the American manufacturer can only get 37 cents' worth of trade, and only paying the Belgian manufacturer or laborer 37 centimes for his franc value of production and labor.

How are these stricken and exhausted and blood-drained countries ever to rehabilitate themselves under such a load and such iniquitous exploitation, and what do the good will and sacrifices of the mass of our people count for toward Belgium if we stand quietly by and see her robbed by the ghouls and vampires who manipulate foreign exchange of sums far greater than all our masses have or can give in their generosity and good will, and what little is left to them besides?

What becomes of the security or guaranty for our loans if they are to have their remaining strength to recover crushed out and wrested from them in that way?

What becomes of the efforts to get the world back into an orderly and prosperous condition if this chaos and distrust-breeding thing is allowed to live and thrive?

What becomes of the American investments in producing and transporting capacities that look for their outlet in export trade and the labor depending on it if these conditions are allowed to continue?

How can a league of nations hope to become a real thing and of benefit to the world when chaos, uncertainty, extra burdens, want, and other anarchy and Bolshevist-breeding conditions are thus being forced on countries and people who have already suffered to the limit of human endurance and reason?

To what has it counted to have put down the Hohenzollern Kaiser of Germany if the Hohenzollern kaisers of foreign exchange are going to put a worse domination on the world, and drive American trade back into Germany's hands again to recreate a new commercial supremacy that will enable them to start another World War within a decade?

I have lived in Europe from January, 1898, to the outbreak of the war, one year during the war, and have been back here since early last May.

I have been engaged in the import and export trade and engineering contracting lines, and during that time have made extensive business trips and prolonged stays in England, Holland, France, Germany, Russia, and Italy, and always in touch with the very heart and pulse of international trade and economic and political conditions.

I knew this country as well before the war as I knew our own country and people, and could see and judge from both sides.

Right after the armistice was declared the spirit of reconstruction and rehabilitation was strong in the hearts of every Belgian, when with their wonderful energy, thrift, and courage they started with full hopes and confidence to meet the tremendous task, with blessings on their lips for the help their big and powerful and generous ally across the seas had brought them, under the glorious Stars and Stripes, and the hope and confidence that they would give to that ally and friend the trade they had formerly given to the hated devastator Germany.

The four and one-half years of tears and anguish, suffering, and death gave place to smiles on the wan faces, strength to the weakened bodies, and almost miraculous changes were taking place.

Plans were made for a rapid reconstruction and rebuilding of the nation's resources and production, industrial and national life, in all of which the big brother and loyal ally over the seas was to be their mentor and friend and to whom they would look for materials and machinery and food.

But the dark cloud of foreign exchange appeared on the horizon and grew at such a rate and to such proportions that to-day all is changed to a feeling of depression; reconstruction plans are being abandoned or modified to meet a long-time basis; those who yesterday looked upon us as friends to-day look upon us with cold suspicion of attempting to rob them and take undue advantage of their suffering and weakness, and the energy that expected to rush ahead hand in hand with us has given place to indifferently and stoically awaiting the time when Germany can again be ready to take her former place and the place reserved for us.

The question is very often heard here as to why the American people, if they are really the friends they have appeared to be, and wish to help Belgium and get her trade, do no take measures to stop this high-handed robbery through the manipulation by a comparatively small number of men of the foreign exchange, and fix a basis of comparative monetary and exchange values between the different countries that will keep it steady under Government control and take it out of the hands of manipulators and speculators who gain an illegitimate power on and profit from the world's destinies and commerce to the advantage of none but themselves, and disadvantage of everyone else, and without producing anything nor giving a counter value of any kind to anyone.

It is nothing more than an overgrown abuse of outgrown world conditions and the manipulation of a modest and reasonable commission for a regular financial service into a high-handed system of outrageous brigandage that levies toll on all passers in all directions without giving any service in return.

It is gambling with loaded dice against the life and blood of nations who have no more show to defend themselves than the rabbit in the coils of a python and is just as grave a menace to the peace of the world and law and order as was the Kaiser of Germany or the Bolshevist leaders.

The franc value of a dollar does not shift from 5.20 francs up to 9 francs and dodge up and down between those points without some individual or group of individuals fixing the time and variations of the exchange and for the benefit and profit of no one but those of their own circle or line of business and to the detriment and loss of everyone else.

I will cite one particular case of one of the best-known Belgian manufacturers of international reputation, who before the war was a friend and admirer of Americans and things American and said with pride that no German machinery nor material had ever entered his plants.

From the beginning of the war up to last June he was among the most ardent haters of Germans and things German.

But he finally became so exasperated at conditions imposed by American exporters and the outrageous robbery and injustice of the present manipulated rates of exchange and the hopelessness of reequipping and restarting his plants and business under such conditions that two weeks ago he went to Germany with rage and bitterness in his heart to order for $170,000 of machinery and materials.

He can not be blamed, as you or I would have done the same under similar circumstances.

I trust, Senator, that you will not find this letter presumptuous nor tiresome, as I have felt it my duty toward our own manufacturers and workers and every one of our national interests connected with export trade, the good will and sacrifices of our Nation, our standing before the world, the interests of Belgium and France, and the peace, order, prosperity, and good will of the world at large called for an expression of this kind from some one familiar with conditions here to some one in the United States who had the same interests at heart and the intelligence to deal with the matter and the power to make his voice heard.

I have been asked by scores of manufacturers and business men here if there was not some way to reach the American people, to put the situation clearly before them, and persuade them to act; and I know of no better way nor of no more competent person than your honorable self as the means of such communication.

Yours, respectfully, E. B. HOTCHKISS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, this letter states with great force what is taking place to the ruin of American commerce and to the destruction of American exporters. I call the attention of the country to the fact that usury in foreign commerce is not covered by any law, and that international exchange is now being subjected to usury of the most extreme type the world has ever seen.

I refuse to denounce the bankers, because they are only human beings after all. They regard themselves as merchants dealing in credits, and if they can sell their credits for a hundred per cent profit, some of them do not hesitate to do so. But usually they take a commission and pass the sale on to a customer.

I do not blame the citizens who buy French and Italian credits in exchange for dollars in this country at the price offered, because they are unconscious of wrong, and they do not know that this matter is undergoing wholesale manipulation, dangerous to international commerce and mischievous to the stability of society itself. If European credits are not solvent and sound, it would be better not to extend the credit at all. If the credit is sound, it ought to be extended at a fair rate of interest, which means a fair rate of exchange. The argument of the letter is substantially sound and paints the picture impressively.

To take grossly unfair advantage of the immediate necessity of these European people, who are perfectly solvent and can repay in full, is absolutely base and immoral and will bring upon America the contempt and hate of the European people. The moral aspect is precisely the same as charging a starving man twice as much as a fair price, because you were taking advantage of his immediate necessity, although you knew he could repay you in full a little later on. Such conduct is despicable beyond words.

With a view to correcting this condition, I took the liberty of writing a letter to the President in the hope of getting some international action that would put an end to this international scandal and disgrace, which I herewith submit:

NOVEMBER 6, 1919.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Will you not permit me again to call your attention to the importance of stabilizing international exchange? Our excess commodity shipments over imports have fallen from 600,000,000 in June to 158,000,000 in September. Our export houses are in distress and the exchange rates are going down to the lowest recorded point—francs, 9.05; lire, 11.07; sterling, 4.15.

The British sterling was sustained by a recent loan of 250,000,000 placed in the United States.

British currency, French currency, Italian currency have gone through a serious inflation, and their paper money is not on a gold par basis. The Italians buying American goods must pay the present high prices plus very high transportation charges; for example, $28 a ton on coal plus twice the total in lire. It is obvious that this is ruinous to our foreign commerce with Italy, and is making it impossible for our allies to get back to normal production as promptly as we had hoped.

The Europeans can not sell credits in the terms of their currency to advantage because they are not only not on a gold basis, but there is reason to fear further inflation in the absence of a declared policy to the contrary.

The gold standard is temporarily broken down, and ought to be promptly restored. It can be done.

The investing public of the United States is able and would be willing to extend the credits necessary to finance our foreign exports, provided the mechanism were available and sound economic policies were declared by the Governments whose trade is involved.

The problem is well understood by many men, but apparently is not well understood by the men and officials responsible for Government.

I regard this question as of the first magnitude, and I respectfully request you to invite an international exchange conference to be held in Washington City with representatives of the leading nations of Europe present to meet with your representatives here.

I request that this suggestion be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and the Secretary of Commerce for an immediate report to you.

Yours, very respectfully,

ROBERT L. OWEN.

Mr. President, international exchange is absolutely at the mercy of houses doing an international banking business. These houses buy and sell international credits as merchandise or commodity, and with a comparatively narrow market they can and do fix the prices at which credits abroad, in terms of pounds sterling, francs, and lire, may be disposed of. A great speculation is going on in this field in New York and London and Paris, without any governmental supervision.

They can subject international commerce to the charge of a hundred per cent usury, and the public, representing the productive elements at home and abroad, are without any protection from this gross abuse.

There is needed an international mechanism adequate to protect international commerce.

If an international conference were called of sufficient dignity and character, it could advise as to what is required to stabilize international exchange and protect international commerce.

It would seem desirable to confine advances to Europe to cover fuel, food, machinery, raw material, and to see that such commodities are confined to productive purposes.

Foreign countries should underwrite these exports in order to get the lowest possible prices.

Such a conference could solve every difficulty by wisely advising governments what to do in the premises.

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. DIAL. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the president of the American Cotton Association in regard to the coal strike, and suggesting a remedy therefor.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. MATTHEWS, S. C., November 7, 1919.

Hon. N. B. DIAL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In order to prevent suffering and impending calamity now facing our whole people, we would urge that you take all necessary steps, in cooperation with Congress, to have the Government take charge of the mines, and have a call issued for 500,000 men from the South, North, East, and West to come to the rescue of our country in this great hour of need, for the purpose of mining coal, and thus relieve the situation, prevent suffering, and preserve our cherished American ideals. Loyal Americans have never failed to respond to calls from their country in a time of need. They realize that it is more noble to prevent suffering than to treat it after it has befallen us, and that it is our duty to preserve our Americanism. We firmly believe that the full quota of 125,000 from each section will loyally respond. The South, if necessary, I feel sure, will double its quota. With winter approaching, our people facing the certainty of intense suffering, and with the foundation stone of our dearly bought liberties and democracy threatened, unless relief is speedily furnished and immediate action taken, we will face a terrible calamity, and under this head an immediate response will result and relief will be furnished.

J. SKOTTOWE WANNAMAKER,
President American Cotton Association.

AMENDMENT OF ARTICLES OF WAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in legislative session, laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1373) to amend the Articles of War, which was, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "342" and insert "1342."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the amendment was put on by the House merely for the purpose of correcting an error in the printing. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COMMISSIONERS OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. FLETCHER. As in legislative session, I present a report of the fourth annual meeting of the National Association of Commissioners of Agriculture, containing some very valuable addresses and proceedings. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it published as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It goes to the Committee on Printing.

LOAD LINES FOR VESSELS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there are many persons interested in what is known as the load-line bill who desire to be heard upon the measure. We had hearings on it before the Committee on Commerce, but I think it is fair that there should be some further consideration given to the bill. I therefore move that the bill (H. R. 3621) to establish load lines for certain vessels be taken from the calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR RANSDELL.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask that the very able address recently delivered by the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] before the American Cotton Association at New Orleans, La., on the cotton situation be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BENEFITS OF A NATIONAL COTTON ASSOCIATION.

[Address of United States Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL before the American Cotton Association at New Orleans, La., Sept. 8, 1919.]

"Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I am delighted to have the opportunity to address such a splendid audience as this gathered together from the entire cotton section of the South.

"You are assembled here for the purpose of discussing the great crop of the South—cotton—and cotton needs discussion at this time, for it is in a very serious situation, a situation which but for the troubles of the world resulting from the war it would not be in.

"It is so evident, my friends, that the American Cotton Association can be of immense benefit to all of us who produce cotton that I scarcely know what to say on the subject assigned to me. This is a day of organization. Practically every business in the world is organized. Labor is organized, and every business with which I am familiar, except farming, is organized. Capital is organized, the people who manufacture cotton products are organized, and most of the people who consume cotton are organized in one form or another. The only people, so far as I know, in this great country of ours who are not organized are the farmers.

"It seems to me it is time for the cotton growers of the South to get on the band wagon of progress as it travels around the world and establish ourselves so thoroughly that we can attain that position which comes from union. 'In union there is strength' is an old and very trite adage, but nevertheless a true one.

"The American Cotton Association has made a fine start to get our cotton growers together in an association that will enable us to unite our forces and work as one man for the common good. I bid it Godspeed, and bespeak for it the cordial support of everyone in the South who is interested in cotton.

"It has been my good fortune to represent, in part, the State of Louisiana in the Capitol at Washington for the past 20 years—14 in the House of Representatives and 6 in the Senate. During that time I have come in contact with a great many national organizations and am in a position to speak from personal experience of the very great value to the interests represented of many of the national organizations in that city. Cotton has been represented there to some extent, but the South as a whole, through an organization such as this, composed of cotton growers of every State and every section of the South, has not been represented systematically in a businesslike way in the Nation's Capital.

"I understand, my friends, that you already have an excellent working organization, but I wish to suggest that you are not going to reach the desired efficiency until you make headquarters in the city of Washington, the Capital of this Republic, the mecca of all good Americans, and the place where all truly beneficial and successful national organizations have their headquarters. [Applause.]

"Perhaps it is inappropriate for me as a Senator from the State of Louisiana to make this suggestion, because I have heard that this beautiful and magnificent Crescent City, the pride of my State and of the South, would probably be selected as the domicile of the organization. I do not know that this is true, but I do know this: If you wish to bring together the people of the entire South—and unless we do bring them all together we can not win—you can not do it successfully in any southern city, even in the great city of New Orleans. You must come to the Nation's Capital. If you will do that, if you will establish the headquarters of your association there, with strong, forceful State organizations in every one of the 11 cotton States working in conjunction with the national association, you will secure the most helpful results, provided, of course, it is a business institution, one that will gather information on every branch of the cotton industry and everything connected with it; not such information, for instance, as might be furnished by some exchange which was perhaps a little prejudiced one way or the other, or by the manufacturers alone, who are interested in getting cotton as cheaply as possible, or by exchanges not particularly interested in giving us good prices for our product, but information derived by our agents and the most intelligent men we can engage at good salaries to represent us and work for us and give us first-hand information, as I have stated, on everything connected with cotton and its kindred industries. If we do not have this kind of information we can not make the success we are entitled to.

"I hope, President Wannamaker, that you are going to attempt something of that kind. I hope, sir, that in my capacity as a Senator from Louisiana, as one Senator from a State which raises several hundred thousand bales of cotton yearly, and which boasts of having the greatest cotton port in the Union, I will know where to go in the city of Washington to get authentic information; that I will know where to go to get authentic statistics; that I will know there is a sentinel on the watch-tower of the great cotton industry, watching all the time, serving faithfully, and keeping every friend of the cotton growers thoroughly posted. [Applause.]

"There are so many branches of this subject that I shall attempt to cover only two or three of them.

"We have heard a great deal of late about the high cost of living, about profiteering, about reducing production. My friends, I am not of those who believe it wise to reduce the cotton acreage of our country in order that we may reduce production and thereby get a better price for the limited number of bales that we do produce. Perhaps that is not a popular statement, but I am in the habit of saying what I believe to be true and wise, whether it is popular or not. I would dislike very much to see the slur of profiteering flung at any portion of the South. I would dislike to face the charge that we are neglecting that great talent given us by the Almighty, the best soil and climate on earth for producing cotton—that we are failing to take proper care of that talent; failing to make it produce, increase, and multiply in a reasonable and proper way.

"Do not misunderstand me. I do not advocate too large a production of cotton. I know that the world needs a considerable quantity of cotton. I know that it depends upon the South to produce two-thirds of all the cotton that is needed, and I believe firmly that the God of the universe expects us to produce that two-thirds of the cotton needed by mankind. At the same time I believe we are expected to receive fair returns for our labor. The man who produces cotton by the work of his hands is just as much entitled to remunerative wages for his labor as any other laborer, and the great trouble with us in the South has been that the producers of cotton have not received fair wages. They have been the poorest paid laborers in our country. They have lived in poor houses, under the most unfavorable conditions. They have been the most illiterate laborers in the Union. Thank God, that condition has changed, at least to some extent, during the last few years. It is the duty of this great association to make it a complete and perfect change in the years to come, and I believe you are going to do it. [Applause.]

"My friends, the South has been raising a great many crops besides cotton. Do you realize that the cotton crop of last year, including the seed, was valued at $1,972,000,000—let me repeat it, $1,972,000,000—while the other crops of the South, the crops separate and distinct from cotton, were valued at $2,373,000,000, these other crops exceeding cotton in value by about $400,000,000. That is a very gratifying thought to me. (I am speaking of the crops of 1918.) We could not have said that a few years ago. We would have been obliged to say that cotton was absolutely the king of southern agriculture; that we were dependent upon cotton to buy everything else that we needed. Now we can say that the other crops of the southern farms exceed cotton in value $400,000,000. That is a very important thing; and what does it mean? It means that we of the South have been raising on the farms the things needed for home consumption. It means that we have become very prosperous. It means that the farmers of the South, should they decide to hold their cotton because they can not get a satisfactory price for it, are able to hold it without asking any favors from Wall Street or anybody else. [Applause.] It means, my friends, that the capital and surplus in the banks of the South at the close of 1918 aggregated $500,000,000. It means that the capital and surplus and undivided profits and deposits of the southern banks at the end of 1918 equaled $2,700,000,000. It means that an era of unexampled prosperity and great wealth has come to the Southland. We have enormous power. We scarcely realize how rich we are, and that our wealth is not mainly represented by cotton, because the other crops of the South exceed cotton in value by $400,000,000. Of course, that takes no account of our vast timber and mineral and manufacturing wealth of all kinds and sorts.

"My friends, one of the things this great association can and should do is to advocate in the strongest manner better homes for the agriculturist. We should provide more conveniences for the housewife; better roads in every agricultural community. We should persuade the toilers in the country that they must have automobiles and auto trucks; that they must depend no longer solely upon the mule and the horse. They must have rapid means of transportation over good roads. They must have community centers and first-rate schools; in short, they must have just as many of the conveniences, the comforts, and the luxuries of life as any other class of our citizens. [Applause.] Place the agriculturist in that position, and we will no longer be confronted by one of the greatest present menaces of civilization, namely, the fact that at the present moment only about 47 per cent of the people of America live in the country, 53 per cent of them living in the cities or in centers of more than 2,500 people. This is a serious menace. You can not travel through any portion of the cultivated lands of America without seeing many abandoned farms. You can see abandoned farms, and plenty of them, within 25 miles of the city of Washington. You can find them in every State of this Union; houses going to wreck, fences falling down, ditches filling up, and weeds growing on land that ought to be covered with crops. And why? Because life is so much more attractive in the cities. Because the luxuries, the conveniences, the comforts, and the privileges of the dwellers in the cities are so much greater than those enjoyed by the people who live in the country. Because, as a rule, the toiler in the city gets more returns for his labor. He gets more money for his labor than the countryman gets—at least the countryman of the South. It has not been so in the grain regions of the West. The great wheat sections are wonderfully prosperous. There is more aggregate wealth per capita in the State of Iowa than in any other State in the Union. There is not a single city of large size in the State of Iowa. Its people have been raising wheat and foodstuffs of all kinds, and they have been practicing such intelligence, such diversified agriculture, that farming lands in Iowa today are selling at as high a figure as $500 per acre. That is true agriculture; that is a system that we can emulate, and your great organization must try to teach the people of the cotton States to emulate those farmers of Iowa. They must be taught to live on highly cultivated lands, to occupy good houses with modern improvements. The barns for live stock in Iowa are better than most of the farm dwellings in the South where our people have not adopted the most improved methods of agriculture. If we will act along that line, we will be in fine shape and will be able—much better able than we are to-day, if that can be—to hold what cotton we do not wish to sell.

"Now, let me repeat for a moment: If we find we are not satisfied with the price offered for our cotton—and I am not going to say what that price ought to be; we can simply figure it out for ourselves; but I say this, if we do not get a price that will yield us a fair return for our labor, a price which will enable us to put our houses in order and which will enable our tenants to earn just as much proportionately as people engaged in other kinds of labor—I do not care what kind of labor it is—unless we can get that price for our cotton, then, say I, let us hold it. Let us hold it, and with the splendid banking institutions which I have described to you, with their two and three-quarter billions of dollars of resources, you will not have to beg anybody to help you hold it. They will be falling over each other to lend you money on warehouse certificates secured by cotton, because there is no better security in the world. Place your cotton in any of the splendid warehouses all over the South, get your warehouse certificates on it, and go to your nearest banker, and you will have no trouble in getting money on that cotton, and at a fair rate of interest. But, supposing we try to hold all this cotton, what is going to happen? We will have, perhaps, out of this crop of 11,000,000 bales the Agricultural Department speaks of, some to carry over. I am not going to discuss that carry over with you. It is too technical for me, and I do not believe anybody understands it. I am satisfied the figures were not gotten up by the cotton producer, but I think it is fair to say there will probably be about 3,000,000 bales of pretty good cotton carried over. That is about right, isn't it, Mr. Wannamaker?

"Mr. WANNAMAKER. Yes, sir.

"Senator RANSDELL. Then we will have a lot of bobtail linters and this rotten stuff that they pick out of our cotton. They picked some out of mine and allowed me 5 cents a pound for it when I was holding out for 32 or 33 cents. There is a great deal of that kind of cotton on hand. Let us assume 3,000,000 bales of good cotton carried over and a growing crop of 11,000,000 bales; that gives us 14,000,000 bales. Now, let us consider the very extreme that it is said this country can consume. I think your association says we can probably handle 7,000,000 bales in America. That is more than we ever did manufacture; but I am willing to take the extreme figures and agree that this country will consume 7,000,000 bales. That leaves 7,000,000 bales still, doesn't it? And what are you going to do with that? It is a pretty serious proposition. There is a surplus of 7,000,000 bales over and above what we can consume at home. England is going to buy some of that from us, but if she buys to-day it will be at a pretty heavy rate of adverse exchange. France is going to buy some of it, but will have to pay something like $1.35 for $1 of our money. Italy is going to buy some; but to convert their lire into American money will cost $1.45 for every dollar of our money. Now, suppose we are getting 33 cents a pound for our cotton; then the Frenchman will have to meet the rate of exchange—35 cents. That is the last rate of exchange I saw quoted. I do not know what it is to-day, but the Frenchman would have to pay about one-third of the 33 cents in meeting the rate of exchange; so that, in round numbers, 44 cents is what he would have to pay for a pound of our cotton. Of course, he will have to pay the ocean freight rates and other expense, and that is a terrible handicap on our brothers in France. This means also a great handicap to our Italian friends who wish to buy our cotton, as they would have to pay 45 cents additional on every dollar. They would have to pay considerably more than the French. It would amount to about 48 cents a pound for the cotton, besides the heavy ocean freight rates. They can not stand that.

"Most of our European friends are bankrupt, or practically so.

"They have gone through the greatest war in the history of all the world. There never was such a war—never such an exhaustive war. The wars of all the world from 1793, when the great Napoleonic War began, to August 1, 1914, cost, in round figures, $20,000,000,000. Remember, that was the cost of warfare in all the world during a period of 121 years, while the Great War which has just ended and which lasted only 4 years cost upward of $100,000,000,000, much more than four times as much as all the wars of all the world for the preceding 121 years. I ask you, How in the name of common sense can these countries that have gone through this war have any money left? They are in a terrible financial condition. They have their people and their institutions left, but they have no money left and they can not buy those 7,000,000 bales of cotton, my friends, unless we help them to do it, just as we helped them to crush out German autocracy. [Applause.] We had to send 2,000,000 men and a great many billions of dollars to the Old World to help put a stop to the German invasion. But for us those Germans would have swept over Europe and then over America, and no one can tell what the result would have been. There is no doubt about that, and we have got to help those people financially, just as we helped them physically. How are we going to do it? What can this great organization do? Why, ladies and gentlemen, you can do the very thing necessary to win the fight. It is up to you to say, as the representatives of these 11 cotton States, these great States with all their vast population and incalculable wealth, whether you will form such a financial institution as will permit you to give credit to the people of Europe for the next two, three, or four years and put them on their feet by selling them our cotton on credit, on long credit and at low rates of interest, until the normal status is resumed, until a fair rate of exchange is resumed, until they are able to pay us back our loans out of the manufacture of cotton goods. How can those people pay back any of the $10,000,000,000 we have loaned them already unless we help them to get on their feet? How can they buy these 7,000,000 bales of cotton unless we help them? And, viewed even from a financial standpoint, it is a selfish advantage to us to help them.

"In my opinion the American Cotton Association, your great and powerful organization here assembled in convention, should, at this very meeting, determine to create at once the big cotton export corporation which was recently discussed so forcibly by members of this association, and especially by Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board. [Applause.] Gov. Harding proposed an export corporation with a capital of $100,000,000, formed for the purpose of selling cotton on terms of credit to Europe. One hundred millions would not give the Europeans enough cotton, but would buy a great many bales, and when we sell them this cotton and get their securities for it we can dispose of those securities and sell them another lot of cotton.

"The question comes up as to how you will get that $100,000,000. A bill is pending in Congress now to authorize the national banks of the country to invest 5 per cent of their capital in the stock of such an organization as this export corporation. I am sure that the laws of a number of the Southern States permit the State banks and loan and trust companies to subscribe whatever amount their directors see fit to the capital stock of such a corporation. If these banks were to put up 5 per cent of their surplus and capital, it would amount to about $25,000,000, and it seems to me, my friends, that every man who raises a bale of cotton could well afford to take stock in that corporation to the extent of $5 a bale, based upon the crop of 1918. He could do it even as a selfish proposition. Right here and now I pledge myself to subscribe $5 for every bale I raised last year, in order to help this plan along. [Applause.] While I believe it is patriotic to do it, I know also that it is selfish to do it, because I know that if we get such an organization started we are going to see an advance in the price of cotton before the next day's sun sets. Just as sure as we determine to put it under way, under the leadership of such men as President Wannamaker, it is going to meet success everywhere; and if we can convince the world that we mean business, that we are going to raise that $100,000,000 and start shipping cotton abroad to be sold in the markets of Europe which need it so badly, the price will go up and all cotton growers will get a great deal more than the $5 a bale that they have contributed by way of advance in price. [Applause.]

"There are very shrewd men on the other side of this game. They are not going to pay much attention to talk, but they will heed action. There is a homely old fable which describes this situation somewhat: An old farmer was out in the field one day and a little lark heard him say, 'This wheat is about ready to cut. I will call in my neighbors and friends and we will cut the grain; it must not remain longer.' When the mother lark got home the little ones told her, with great trepidation, 'We have got to move. We can't stay in this field any longer.' She said, 'My children, don't be uneasy. We won't have to move.' A couple of days later when the mother lark returned the little ones said to her in great distress, 'Mother, while you were away the farmer came to this field and said, "I am tired of waiting for my neighbors and friends to come in and help me cut this wheat; it's suffering; it's beginning to waste; I will go home, sharpen my scythe and mowing machine, and to-morrow morning as soon as the sun rises my boys and I will come out here and we will harvest this grain."' Then said the mother lark, 'My children, it's time for us to move.'

"Let us apply that to our situation. If we expect New York to help us finance this cotton, we are not going to be helped. If we expect great financial institutions and trusts to market this cotton for us, it will not be marketed, except on terms suitable to Mr. George McFadden and his friends. [Great applause.] But if we show that we are going to market it ourselves, that we are going to raise the money, that we are going to organize an export corporation and ship this cotton ourselves as Southerners, as cotton producers, then we will get results. Then we will get a good and satisfactory price, and under no circumstances should we have more than a reasonable and proper price.

"Before closing, I wish to say just one other word. I do not want to bring any politics into this meeting, and the great question I propose to discuss for a moment is not political. I simply want to say that I do not believe it humanly possible for this world to get on a sound, normal business basis until we have a declaration of peace, and we can not have peace until the covenant of the league of nations is ratified by the American people. [Great applause.] It is one of the greatest documents ever penned for the benefit of the human race. It may contain some provisions that should be changed, but so did the Constitution of the United States when first adopted, and we know that 10 amendments were added to that immortal document shortly after its adoption. We know that since then eight others have been adopted, and those of us who believe, as I do, in woman suffrage believe we will have another before very long. [Applause.] It is on the way—it is coming—and that will make the nineteenth addition or change in the greatest Constitution that a free people ever devised. The covenant of the league of nations will, in my judgment, do for mankind what the Constitution of the United States has done for America, and I say to you representatives of every Southern cotton State, if you desire quick results, if you desire to secure beneficial results for cotton, in Heaven's name persuade your Senators to vote for the immediate ratification of the league. [Applause.]

"Before closing my remarks, and to carry out in a practical way that which I have outlined in this desultory manner, I wish to propose the following resolution and ask that it be referred to the resolution committee of this organization:

"Whereas the only immediate relief possible for the cotton famine now threatening Europe as the result of a lack of financial credit is to furnish such credit; and

"Whereas the only relief to the serious situation now facing the cotton industry of the South is to open up European markets which are in pressing need of raw cotton; and

"Whereas Europe is not only in desperate need of cotton but in special need of low-grade cotton, for which there is no American market resulting in the absolute nonsale of low grades, except at enormous sacrifice; and

"Whereas certain leading bankers and financiers, who have given the most careful consideration to this question, think that the only possible relief is to furnish Europe with credits and to organize an export corporation similar to the one recommended by Gov. W. P. G. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, who is a Southerner of Southerners from the cotton State of Alabama. [Applause.]: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this association appoint a special committee of nine to confer with Gov. Harding at once, for the purpose of cooperating with him and with full power to take all necessary steps to complete the organization of an export corporation as outlined above.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I thank you for your attention. [Applause.]"

INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on the 31st of last month I addressed the Senate upon Part XIII of the treaty, and took occasion to comment upon the admission into the International Labor Conference now in session in Washington of representatives from Germany and Austria, with whom the United States is still technically at war. My attention has since been directed to the November number of the American Federationist, containing a series of cablegrams passed between the Government of the United States, acting for Mr. Gompers, and certain officials in Europe concerning that subject. They recite the preliminary negotiations resulting in the grant of passports to the German and Austrian delegates to this conference. They are illuminating and extraordinary. I therefore ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the contents of pages 1055 and 1056 of the American Federationist for November and ask that they be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"GERMANY AND AUSTRIA IN INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE.

"Cablegrams giving the details of the invitations to Germany and Austria to be represented in the International Labor Conference held in Washington beginning October 29 are herewith submitted:

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the only comment I care at present to make upon this series of cablegrams is that the Department of State occupies the position of messenger boy in the transmission of messages between the American plenipotentiary, Mr. Gompers, and the British plenipotentiary, Mr. Barnes.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, there are two things in connection with the amendment of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] which it seems to me ought to be borne in mind by the Senate in determining that proposed amendment.

The Senator from Colorado proposes that out of the second reservation there shall be taken these words:

> And notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

The first thing that it seems to me we ought to bear in mind is that the reservation without the amendment does not deprive the President of the United States of his right to give notice of withdrawal at any time when he so elects to do, because the treaty expressly provides that "any member of the league" may give notice of withdrawal. The United States is a member of the league. The one officer to represent the United States in international relations is the President. He alone speaks to other nations in the name of the country, and therefore notice of withdrawal by the United States can be given only by the Chief Executive, and he can give that notice any time he may think best and his right is unimpaired by the reservation as it now reads.

What does the reservation do? The reservation, in addition to, and not in deprivation of, the power of the President to give the notice of withdrawal, adds to the President's power to give notice of withdrawal the additional power, by a concurrent resolution of Congress, to give that same notice. So that if the reservation is adopted without the change suggested by the Senator from Colorado, it follows that either the President of the United States may give notice of withdrawal, or, if for any reason he does not care to give that notice, Congress, independently of the President, may by concurrent resolution give that notice of withdrawal.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator take the position that the President does not have to sign a concurrent resolution?

Mr. SPENCER. I was about to discuss that at once, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Idaho.

The second proposition which it seems to me we ought to bear in mind is that there are, in our Government, two supreme laws of the land. One of them is the Constitution and the other is the treaties of the United States. The supreme law of the United States is a two-armed law, one constitutional and one treaty.

It is quite true, as the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] so clearly said yesterday, that the Constitution provides that "every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary shall be presented to the President of the United States," except on a question of adjournment; but that constitutional provision is in the legislative article of the Constitution (Art. I, sec. 7), and has to do with legislative enactments, and has only to do with legislative enactments; and therefore when in the legislative function of the Government any concurrent resolution or order or vote is passed by both branches of Congress it needs the consent of the President to make it effective. But that is not true with regard to treaties, which are also, like the Constitution, the supreme law of the land. [illegible] Constitution is the supreme law of the land with regard to legislation, so are treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the Constitution the supreme law of the land. Therefore when this treaty provides as one method of giving notice of withdrawal that a concurrent resolution of Congress can give that notice, it follows that this concurrent resolution itself is just as effective without the signature of the President as the power of the President is unquestioned to himself give a notice of withdrawal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The treaty is only the supreme law of the land when it is made in pursuance of the Constitution. Is not that true?

Mr. SPENCER. It is undoubtedly true, and the Constitution is supreme when any of its provisions come in conflict with treaty provisions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The point that the Senator from Montana made, as I understood, was that this provision was not in accordance with the Constitution, and it seemed to me that the Senator begged the question.

Mr. SPENCER. It was there that I tried to make the distinction between the constitutional provision requiring that resolutions which have to do with legislation must be presented to the President; and treaties, which, like the Constitution, are equally the supreme law of the land, and can make their own provisions for their termination, and if they require simply a concurrent resolution of Congress, without Executive approval, it is entirely within the treaty-making power to so provide. Undoubtedly, may I add, if there came a clear difference between the provisions of the Constitution and of a treaty, the constitutional provisions would be supreme. My point is that there is no variance between them.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question, if it will not interfere with the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not sure that I understood the Senator from Missouri correctly, and I want to make sure. Does the Senator claim that the President of the United States alone may withdraw this country from the league?

Mr. SPENCER. Without any doubt, the President of the United States may give notice of the withdrawal by his own authority and in his own right, as the Chief Executive of this Nation, and after that notice of withdrawal is given automatically the expiration of two years of time ends the treaty.

Mr. REED. Where does he get that power?

Mr. SPENCER. From the people, when they elected him President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that the Senator from Colorado has yielded to me.

Mr. THOMAS. I yielded to the Senator from Connecticut.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado yielded to the Senator from Connecticut, and not to a chorus.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator mean that if the Congress of the United States wanted this country to stay in the league, the President could take the country out of the league in spite of the wish of Congress?

Mr. SPENCER. I mean to say, Mr. President, that if the President of the United States saw fit to give notice of withdrawal, that notice of withdrawal would be effective. If it was in violation of or in contradiction to the wishes of the Congress at the time, there would be certain restrictive action, like a joint resolution of Congress, which would be persuasive upon the President, but it would not deprive him of his power.

Why, Mr. President, the case is precisely similar to that which confronts us now. If the Senate, by unanimous vote, should approve this treaty, that does not make the treaty. The President alone can send that treaty to the other signatory powers. His is the only voice which speaks for the United States in international relations; and if he pigeonholes the treaty, though every Senator was in favor of ratification, the treaty would never come into effect. Such is the power of the Chief Executive of the Nation, and it illustrates the power of the President with regard to withdrawal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That, of course, is because the President is part of the treaty-making power. In my opinion that is not at all germane to the question of whether, after this country has once joined the league by the treaty-making power, consisting of both the President and the Senate, the President may take us out of the league without the consent of either branch of Congress. I wanted to ask the Senator, in pursuance of that thought, to make sure that I understand him, whether his claim is that the President may only give the notice required as a condition precedent, or that he may actually withdraw us after the notice has been given.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, if there is inserted in this treaty no qualifying clause, as to any different methods of withdrawal, the President alone may give that notice, and on the termination of two years we are out of the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me that that would be claiming that the President himself could denounce the treaty and undo the action of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. May I, in further answer to the Senator from Connecticut, state that the remedy is simple, if the difficulty seems great, because the treaty provides that a nation, on giving two years' notice, may withdraw. Who represents the nation for the purpose of withdrawal? Nobody but the chief executive of that nation. Neither the senate nor the house of representatives. The President alone represents this Nation in its international relationships, and if it is not desired that the President alone should give notice of withdrawal, then it is entirely within the treaty-making power to create an additional method of termination, and this is precisely what the reservation does by providing that notice of withdrawal may be given by a concurrent resolution of Congress.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. THOMAS. For what purpose?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was going to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield for a question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Missouri has just made the statement, which is, of course, accurate, that treaties made on our part, in pursuance of the Constitution, are the supreme law of the land. A treaty providing for membership in the league of nations, if you regard this as an ordinary treaty, constitutes a part of the supreme law of the land. Does the Senator from Missouri claim that the President, by his sole act, can repeal the supreme law of the land?

Mr. SPENCER. Unless there is some qualifying clause in the treaty itself, he is the only power who can act for this Nation in the notice of withdrawal, exactly as he is the only power that can forward to the other nations the present treaty after we ratify it.

He is, by virtue of his office, the representative of the United States in dealing with other nations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], as I apprehend it, supports my contention of yesterday. He bases his objection to the pending motion to amend, first, upon the theory that the President of the United States eo ipso possesses the power of giving the notice now provided for in the proposed treaty, and, secondly, that the proposed concurrent resolution, not being legislative in its character but arising under the treaty-making power, is within the competence of the Senate to enact. If these assertions can be sustained, the argument is sound; but if the premises are untenable, then the logic of the Senator must lead him astray.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I know that the Senator is making a splendid argument, but I can not hear him.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped for order.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not sure that I am making any argument; if so, Senators would probably listen to me.

I can not consent to the broad proposition that the President of the United States, by virtue of his office, has the power to give notice of the termination of that treaty under a clause like that contained in the proposed treaty. I concede, of course, that whenever any notice is given, it must be through the agency of the Executive office.

Unless the word "member" in the article to which this reservation is aimed and the word "President," as we understand it, are equivalents, it might follow that by the enactment of this treaty, we endow the Executive with authority in his own discretion and in his own judgment to give the notice which will terminate it. We might have the authority so to determine by giving him that power expressly. But if this treaty shall become the supreme law of the land when it is ratified and the ratifications exchanged, it would be surprising if the Executive could terminate that supreme law of his own volition under a provision whereby notice to that effect could, after a given time thereafter, so operate. If the President has such power of termination, then he possesses an authority which goes very far indeed.

The member is the Nation, and the Nation speaks in all matters of legislation by Congress and the President, and in all matters of treaty by the President and the Senate. If, therefore, the amendment now under consideration shall be carried, it leaves the method of giving notice precisely as the original draft of the treaty leaves it, and in the absence of any express method of termination, in my judgment, it can only be done by a joint resolution or by a legislative enactment requiring the approval of the Executive.

If that conclusion is correct, and I am constrained to think it is, then it must follow that neither branch representing the Nation should give the notice on its own volition. In other words, if it is incompetent for the Executive authority, without action by Congress, to give the notice, we can not endow the Congress with separate authority to do it upon the theory that we can provide that the treaty shall terminate upon the happening of any contingency.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] propounded a question to me yesterday upon that subject which was a very important one, which I will read:

> Does not the Senator concede that it would be perfectly competent to provide in any treaty that it should cease to be operative upon the happening of any certain event?

I answered that I thought so. The Senator then propounded this query:

> And could not that event be a concurrent resolution of Congress?
> Mr. THOMAS. Well, I doubt it.

Upon reflection, Mr. President, I am satisfied that the answer is no. We have the legislative and a part of the treaty-making power, in each of which the President must cooperate. I do not believe Congress has power to enact a statute and provide that it shall cease to be operative one year after Congress shall, by a concurrent resolution, so determine, because that would be legislation terminating the act by a contingency which can occur only by the exercise of one part of the lawmaking power.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment. It would be quite as possible and quite as logical for Congress to enact a law providing that it shall terminate at the end of six years if the President shall at that time determine to veto it, as to provide that such a statute shall terminate by the action of the Senate and the House expressed in a concurrent resolution. Now I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I would like to ask the Senator this question: If the Congress of the United States should pass an act with a proviso that said act may be suspended or terminated at any time by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States, would not that act be legal, would it not be constitutional, and could not the method of putting an end to it or suspending it be carried out as provided in the act?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that depends entirely upon the construction to be given to that clause of the Constitution to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] referred and which reads:

> Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to add that, in my judgment, that settles the proposition and makes it no longer academic. The concurrent resolution which the Senator supposes could only become effective by the signature of the President of the United States. I now yield.

Mr. FALL. The point which I desire to make is the distinction that has already been made, and which was passed upon, of course, by the Senate of the United States. In the time of John C. Calhoun the very article which the Senator has referred to was passed upon. I read from Gilfry's Precedents:

> The Vice President (John C. Calhoun) stated to the Senate that he entertained doubts whether the last clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States and the twenty-fifth rule for conducting business in the Senate do not require that this resolution should be treated, in all respects, as a subject to be laid before the President of the United States for his approval; and that, with a view to a more correct decision, he would call for the sense of the Senate on the question, "Does this resolution require three readings?" which was accordingly put and determined in the negative.

Mr. THOMAS. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. FALL. I read from page 473 of the Precedents. The Senator will find in a note under that decision a reference to a report of the Judiciary Committee in the Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, made by Senator Hill, of New York, with reference to a concurrent resolution, in which the Judiciary Committee made the distinction referred to by the Senator from Missouri as to a purely legislative act and one not purely legislative in its nature. Of course, I do not agree with the Senator from Colorado that a notice of this kind, provided by the terms of a treaty itself, can not be given in any way under heaven that the treaty-making power provides that it may be made, and when it provides that it may be made by a concurrent resolution, simply giving notice of a withdrawal from the treaty, it is in no sense at all a legislative act.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the logical deduction from that position is that we have power, if we see fit to exercise it, to provide that this treaty shall cease to be operative when the Empire of Japan so determines, or when some other act or policy of a power other than our own shall find expression.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. FALL. I unhesitatingly accept that as the true construction, that the Senate of the United States now, in making this treaty, can provide any method of terminating any portion of it which it pleases.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, one of the bases of my regard for and admiration of my friend the Senator from New Mexico is that he has the courage of his convictions and is prepared to accept any or all their logical consequences.

Mr. FALL. Yes; I will even accept any consequence that Japan might visit upon us.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true. That is a virtue, Mr. President, the general prevalence of which I would welcome with great joy, particularly now, when confronted by many crises.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment, and I will yield. But I think, notwithstanding my respect and regard for the legal ability and the experience of the Senator from New Mexico, the conclusion so unhesitatingly accepted by him is a demonstration of our inability to impose such a condition as I am seeking to exclude from this particular reservation.

I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I wish to ask the Senator's opinion on the question whether, in our code of war legislation, practically every measure contains a provision that when the President ascertains and proclaims the fact that peace has been restored, the law shall lapse and become noneffective. That is contained in a number of the statutes.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true.

Mr. GORE. It is a part of the law. Those statutes are the supreme law of the land, just as this treaty will be. Does not the Senator think if we could authorize the President to terminate a supreme law of the land by proclamation, could not Congress provide for the termination of a supreme law of the land upon the happening of an event defined in the law itself?

Mr. THOMAS. The legislation to which the Senator refers is extraordinary legislation. It depends for its efficacy upon the extraordinary conditions which made it essential and it is terminable not by but because of the President's official announcement that the war has ended. I do not think we can or should gauge the status of any constitutional proposition by that which is done in periods of national exigency. I believe that we can, however, enact legislation temporarily and that we can make it terminable on the happening of a future, albeit a remote, certainty.

But to provide that a treaty may be disposed of by such a method as is here attempted is to insert in treaty legislation a condition that is not only unprecedented, I will not say wholly so, but one which seems to interfere with and impinge upon that element of the treaty-making power which is peculiarly an Executive function. The authority which we possess, the share which we have in the making of treaties, comes to us by special provision of the Constitution. Without it, we would have none. It is the power of the Executive. It belongs to the administrative——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. It is part of the Executive authority. It is the Executive authority, except as modified by the provisions of our own Constitution.

I will yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator make a distinction between Executive power to negotiate a treaty and the power to terminate a treaty?

Mr. THOMAS. I certainly do.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is undoubtedly correct so far as negotiating a treaty is concerned, that that is exclusively and solely an Executive function; but the termination of a treaty, which is a termination of the supreme law of the land, is not exclusively an Executive function. The Senator just emphasized that a moment ago.

Mr. THOMAS. It would be an Executive function exclusively in the absence of constitutional provisions which give the Senate a share in its exercise.

Mr. GORE. The Senator just commented a moment ago on the fact that it would be an anomalous situation if the Executive should on his own motion terminate the supreme law of the land.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; because we, under the Constitution, share that authority with him.

I yield to the Senator from North Dakota. I was about to yield the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. The question which I wish to ask the Senator is to get a clear idea of his view. Does he concede that the Senate may add a provision or by amendment provide in the treaty that it may be terminated by the President giving notice of termination? Can we provide that the President can terminate a treaty?

Mr. THOMAS. At first blush I would answer that in the affirmative.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood the Senator conceded that yesterday, and if he does concede it, he concedes the right to have a treaty terminated by a power other than a power of legislation, and if it may be terminated by an authority that is not a legislative authority, then, admitting what the Senator claims that a concurrent resolution is not effective as legislation unless it is signed by the President, may we not also provide that it may be done by an act of the two branches of Congress which will not amount to legislation, the same as we may provide that it may be done by the President, which act would not amount to legislation?

Mr. THOMAS. I think it is difficult to admit the power of Congress to provide in the one direction without admitting the power to provide in the other. What I said yesterday upon the subject was this:

> It was a part of the President's duty, in the exercise of Executive authority, to give notice of a withdrawal in the event that the United States determined to exercise its right of withdrawal; but the authority to withdraw is another thing. That might depend—and, perhaps, must depend—upon the joint action of the legislative and executive authorities.

And that is the position which I still occupy upon the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. HITCHCOCK addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to interject a statement?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the expression has been used rather loosely that this involves the termination of a treaty. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the treaty of peace with Germany still remains, and that all the withdrawal amounts to is a withdrawal of the United States from membership in an organization created under the treaty. It is not the ending of the treaty at all; it is simply the withdrawal from an organization created by the treaty. The treaty still remains.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true, but I do not think that affects the question. If we can withdraw from the treaty by a concurrent resolution provided for in the treaty, I suppose we can abrogate any part of it in similar fashion.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, whether withdrawal from the league of nations constitutes an exercise of the treaty-making power, and whether such withdrawal is analogous in a legal sense to the abrogation of the treaty, is a question that may require very serious consideration. Beyond doubt withdrawal from the league of nations would very materially affect our relations with other nations. It would very materially modify our treaty obligations. The act of withdrawal should not, therefore, be dependent upon the pleasure of the majority of the two Houses in Congress. If it is to be defined at all, it should be provided for by joint resolution rather than by concurrent resolution.

I take issue with the statement made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] that if no provision relative to withdrawal be incorporated in the treaty, the President, on his own motion and without the concurrence of either or both branches of Congress, could give notice of withdrawal. While the authorities on the subject are somewhat confusing, and while the Senate precedents, as in almost every disputed case, are somewhat conflicting, I believe that I can successfully maintain that the proper, the constitutional, the customary method of giving such notice as is contemplated in the reservation is through some action which contemplates the concurrence of the Executive and the two Houses of Congress.

In making that statement I admit that the precedents are not entirely uniform upon the point, but I do believe the position is sustained by the weight of authority.

I call attention to Crandall on Treaties—Their Making and Enforcement, page 458, where this precise subject is discussed. Under the head of "Termination by notice in the United States," I find these citations and authorities:

> In the United States some doubt has existed as to what body is to give notice. On the recommendation of President Polk Congress passed a joint resolution approved April 27, 1846, to authorize the President, at his discretion, to give the required notice for the termination of the treaty with Great Britain of August 6, 1827, relative to the joint occupation of the Northwest Territory. * * * Although notice was duly given, the treaty was, as a matter of fact, superseded before the expiration of the time required by the treaty as sufficient notice by a new treaty signed June 15, 1846.

Here let me observe that under the treaty-making power, the President, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring, can unquestionably make a new treaty which would have the effect of superseding or abrogating any former treaty in so far as the latter might be in conflict with the new treaty, and it is undoubtedly true that Congress by act can abrogate any existing treaty, and it can render inoperative any treaty that requires legislation to carry it into effect by failing or refusing to legislate.

It is observable that the great majority of treaties into which the United States has entered contemplate legislation to make them effective. No one here will contend that a treaty of that character can be abrogated or repealed by the Executive alone. No one will contend that the President of the United States has the power to repeal an act of Congress without the concurrence of the two Houses of Congress. So that, as to the great body of treaties into which the United States has entered and which have required legislation to make them effective, undoubtedly the weight of authority is that before they can be abrogated there must be some action, either a joint resolution or an act passed by the Congress and approved by the President, or passed over his veto, before that end can be accomplished. There are instances in which the treaty-making power, the President with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present, has assumed to terminate a treaty. There is no case where the two Houses of Congress without the concurrence of the Executive have been sustained in the exercise of such a power.

Now, I think, Mr. President, notwithstanding there is some conflict in authorities and that there has been much discussion of the subject in the Senate, that the following conclusions are sustained by the cases cited in the volume to which I have already referred:

First. Notice of withdrawal undoubtedly can be given by joint resolution or act of Congress. Any treaty can be terminated in that way.

Second. It is doubtful whether the Executive alone and independent of Congress can terminate a treaty or give notice of withdrawal, save perhaps when the treaty relates to acts or functions which are exclusively within his power. Cases are conceivable in which the Executive might terminate a treaty in spite of Congress, but they have rarely arisen.

Third. There is no power in either or both Houses of Congress to terminate a treaty without the approval of the President or by overriding his veto.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator has invited attention to the treaty which existed between the United States and Great Britain with respect to the Northwest Territory. My recollection of that treaty is that it merely prescribed that either of the signatory powers, upon notice, might denounce the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator recall whether there was any further provision as to the method of notice, by whom it should be given, or was it just general language?

Mr. ROBINSON. It was a general provision. I have that case on the desk here and am going to refer to it in just a moment.

In connection with the treaty mentioned by the Senator from Utah, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations made a very elaborate report. That occurred in 1856, and I am going to put that in the RECORD, because it is an interesting, though not in all respects in my opinion illuminating, discussion of the subject.

Let me go back now to what I was discussing when the Senator from Utah made his inquiry:

> Although notice was duly given, the treaty was, as a matter of fact, superseded before the expiration of the time required by the treaty as sufficient notice by a new treaty signed June 15, 1846. Ten years later the question was discussed at some length in the Senate with reference to the proposed termination of the treaty of commerce and navigation with Denmark of April 26, 1826. President Pierce, in his annual message to Congress, December 4, 1854, declared it expedient that the required notice for its termination should be given. The Senate in executive session, March 3, 1855, unanimously passed such a resolution. Acting under the authority of this resolution, the Executive caused the notice to be given to the Government of Denmark April 14, 1855. Subsequently the authority of the resolution was questioned by Mr. Sumner in the Senate, avowedly on the ground that it would be equivalent to a repeal of a law of the land by the action of the Senate alone. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the matter was referred, made a full report April 7, 1856, in which the right of the Senate to authorize notice to be given was maintained.

I want to allude briefly to that report and to ask, in connection with the remarks which I am making, that the report be printed in full in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will read a few paragraphs from the report to disclose the conclusions which the committee reached:

> The resolution of the Senate directing the committee to consider "the expediency of some act of legislation" by which the convention with Denmark may be "effectively abrogated in conformity with the requirements of the Constitution under which every treaty is a part of the 'supreme law of the land,'" would seem to direct this inquiry as interesting only to this Government or to its citizens; that is to say, the resolution is construed to assume that the notice which has been given is effectual to terminate the convention as between the two Governments when the period limited for such termination shall expire, and requires the committee to consider as a domestic question whether this convention, although abrogated so far as Denmark is concerned by the notice which has been given, yet being "the supreme law of the land" some act of legislation by Congress may not be necessary to repeal or to annul it as such law. At least such is the construction placed by the committee on the resolution—that whether such legislation be necessary or no, as to Denmark the treaty is at an end when the time limited by the notice shall expire.
> But as to this convention, and all others of like character, the committee are clear in the opinion that it is competent for the President and Senate, acting together, to terminate it in the manner prescribed by the eleventh article without the aid or intervention of legislation by Congress, and that when so terminated it is at an end to every intent, both as a contract between the Governments and as a law of the land.

That conclusion was based on the theory that the treaty-making power is vested exclusively in the President and in the Senate. I read again:

> By the Constitution of the United States the whole power to make treaties is vested in the President and Senate. In Article II, section 2, granting power to the President, it provides that—
> "He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

The question then presented by the resolution is, after a treaty is so made, where power is reserved by it to either party to terminate it on notice, Can the treaty-making power give such notice, or is it such an exercise of political power as to require the concurrence of the House of Representatives through the forms of legislation?

A treaty between nations has its sanction, by international law, in the good faith of the contracting parties, added to which, in this country, it becomes "the supreme law of the land," and thus, to our own citizens, it is further clothed with the obligations of domestic law.

To violate a treaty, it is agreed among civilized nations, is the highest breach of national faith—which is national honor—and is justly declared to be sufficient cause of war; or if a treaty be violated or disregarded by one of the parties, the other may hold itself released from its obligation and act accordingly.

There is, of course, no provision to be found in the Constitution assigning power to any department of the Government to abrogate or annul existing treaties; and yet occasions may arise where the national honor as well as safety may require the Government to hold itself and its citizens released from treaty obligations by declaring such treaties null. Such an occasion was presented in our relations with France in 1798, and it was then determined that Congress, by law, could, for the reasons assigned in the preamble to this act, declare the treaties with that power at an end.

It was a hostile act, as the preamble shows, and was looked upon at the time as the precursor of war, if not an act of war itself. There was no provision in the treaties with France to terminate them at the will of the contracting parties, and hence, as well to preserve the honor of the country as to resent the injurious conduct of France, there was no alternative but to declare war or to declare the treaties null.

I now omit a portion of the text of the report—

And whether it be competent or not to the President and Senate, as the treaty-making power, to abrogate treaties where no such right is reserved (a question not necessary to be brought into discussion here) the committee entertain no doubt that where the right to terminate a treaty at discretion is reserved in the treaty itself such discretion resides in the President and Senate.

I omit another portion of the text.

Mr. SWANSON. Has the Senator before him article 11 of that treaty, which provided for its repeal? If so, will the Senator read that provision?

Mr. ROBINSON. It did not provide for its repeal but for its termination by notice from either party. It did not determine the character of the notice; there was no effort made in the treaty to determine the character of the notice.

Mr. SWANSON. Has the Senator the article before him?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not the language before me, but I am sure that what I have stated is a correct summary of its intention and purpose.

"The President and Senate could certainly terminate this treaty or any other, with the consent of the opposite contracting party, by the negotiation of a new treaty in terms annulling it. And what is the present case but such consent, providing in advance for its termination on a contingency and without new negotiations."

The committee thus held the opinion that in the particular case before it, taking into consideration the language of the treaty itself and the character of the provision in the treaty, the treaty-making power, the President and the Senate, alone could give the notice.

The weight of authority, in my opinion, is that certainly as to all treaties which require laws to make them effective, and probably as to all other treaties, the best, if not the only proper, means of terminating them is by an act of Congress or a joint resolution, unless another method is authorized by law already existing.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Would not the Senator's broad statement just made be subject to the qualification that if there was nothing said in the treaty itself as to the manner of its termination, then it would require legislation by the legislative branch of the Government?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not stated, and I hope the Senator has not understood me to state, that under no circumstances could the Executive alone, by an exchange of notes, terminate a treaty. I have not taken that position; I have merely said that the weight of authority is that the best, if not the only, means of terminating a treaty which has required the enactment of legislation to make it effective is by the concurrence of the Executive and the legislative departments. There may be cases where the treaty-making power, there may be other cases where the Executive alone, has the authority to terminate a treaty, but these cases are exceptional. There are exceptional cases, some of which, I think, I could mention, as, for instance, where the treaty itself provides the manner and agency of termination, and where that manner and agency of termination are prescribed by law, and perhaps where the obligation under the treaty is a function vested by our Constitution solely in the President he may give the notice. I wish to return now to the point at issue.

I read again from Crandall, at page 459:

The treaty was considered by the Executive as terminated on April 15, 1856, pursuant to the notice; but by article 5 of the treaty of April 11, 1857, it was, with the exception of the fifth article, renewed. The following treaties have subsequently been terminated, pursuant to notice given by the Government of the United States in each instance on the authority of a joint resolution of Congress: Convention with Great Britain of June 5, 1854; treaty with Belgium of July 17, 1858; and articles 18–25, inclusive, and article 30 of the treaty with Great Britain of May 8, 1871. It should, however, be noted that in case of the convention of 1854 and the articles of the treaty of 1871 treaty provisions were terminated which had, in accordance with an express reservation in the treaty itself, been carried into effect by congressional legislation.

That is a distinction which I regard as important. It seems to me that if a treaty incorporates a provision requiring notice, and Congress by legislative act approves it, that becomes effective beyond any question or doubt, no matter what manner of termination may be provided in the treaty and in the legislation. I think perhaps it is competent in a treaty to say that it may be terminated by concurrent resolution, provided Congress, with the approval of the President, by some act or joint resolution, gives vitality to that provision; but if that is not done I maintain that the position taken by the Senator from Montana yesterday is correct, that, since this notice on its face requires the concurrence of the House of Representatives and of the Senate, in order for it to become effective it must be signed by the President; and if not signed by him it must be passed over his veto; otherwise the provision of the Constitution referred to by the Senator from Montana would be meaningless. Its language is plain; there is no ambiguity in it. If this resolution, in order to become effective, requires the concurrence of both Houses of Congress, then the Constitution of the United States, which can not be repealed or modified by this treaty, becomes effective and the limitations upon the procedure under the treaty imposed by the Constitution must be complied with.

Congress can not enlarge or increase its own powers. The powers of Congress are defined by the Constitution. By that instrument any order, measure, or vote which requires the concurrence of both Houses must be signed by the President or passed over his veto. Since the proposed reservation requires the concurrence of both Houses in a resolution of withdrawal, that resolution can have no legal effect unless approved by the President or passed over his veto.

Mr. KING. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him another question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly not.

Mr. KING. Supposing that the resolution were modified so as to read that the notice may be given by the Senate alone or by a resolution of the Senate, and the House were not mentioned, would the Senator take the same position that he has just now announced?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I would. I think it would not only be of very doubtful validity but I think it would be a procedure which would not be justified in sound public policy.

Now, I wish to read just a little more from this authority, and then I am going to hasten to the conclusion of my remarks on this subject:

A notice of the intention of the United States to terminate the agreement with Great Britain of 1817, relative to vessels of war on the Great Lakes, was given, pursuant to the reservation of that right, by the Executive on November 25, 1864. A resolution with a view to such termination had during the preceding session of Congress passed the House, but had failed of consideration in the Senate. After the notice had been communicated to the British Government a joint resolution was passed by Congress, approved February 9, 1865, which "adopted and ratified" the notice "as if the same had been authorized by Congress." Notwithstanding this legislative sanction, the notice was, before the expiration of the required six months, withdrawn by the Executive; and the arrangement has subsequently been recognized by both Governments as subsisting. Notice of the intention of the United States to terminate the treaty with Russia of December 18, 1832, was communicated, by direction of the President, to the Russian Government on December 17, 1911.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before the Senator passes from the convention with Great Britain, the Rush-Bagot treaty, I should like to suggest, because the action on that convention reinforces the distinction drawn by the Senator between various kinds of treaties, that the convention with Great Britain required nothing whatever on the part of Congress; it did not require a dollar of appropriation nor any act by Congress; it was simply one of negation, to wit, that we would not put certain ships on the Great Lakes; and, I presume, acting on that theory, the President, notwithstanding the joint resolution giving notice of abrogation, himself said that it was going to be continued, and it has been continued.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator from Arizona for his suggestion.

A notice of the intention of the United States to terminate the treaty with Russia of December 18, 1832, was communicated, by direction of the President, to the Russian Government on December 17, 1911. A joint resolution for the abrogation of the treaty, but in terms unacceptable to the President, had already been passed by the House of Representatives. In a message of December 18, 1911, the President advised the Senate, "as a part of the treaty-making power," of his action in giving the notice "with a view to its ratification and approval" by that body. A joint resolution was thereafter passed by both Houses, and approved December 21, 1911, which adopted and ratified the notice thus given.

The notice given March 23, 1899, to the Swiss Government by the Secretary of State of the intention of this Government to terminate articles 8–12 of the treaty of November 25, 1850, does not appear to have had any other than Executive authority.

Mr. President, in view of these authorities, let me inquire why it is insisted here that this unusual and very exceptional provision should be incorporated in a reservation to this treaty? It is elementary law that the Executive is the sole agency through whom this Government may communicate with foreign nations. Suppose that a concurrent resolution should pass both Houses of Congress? That is not legislation. That is a mere expression of opinion. Before any measure can become effective and binding as law it must either receive the signature of the President or be passed by a two-thirds majority over his veto. Suppose that the Senate should pass this reservation as proposed by the majority of the committee, and that the Congress in the next session should, by a bare majority, give the notice contemplated by the reservation, and the Executive should refuse to communicate it because under the Constitution it was not a valid act of the Congress of the United States. What would then be the position of the United States? Would we be in or out of the league? I should like to have some Senator who is supporting this committee provision answer me, what is the purpose of it? Why adopt a procedure of doubtful validity?

According to all of the precedents the action of Congress affecting foreign nations must be communicated through the Executive. Senators who are friendly to the league of nations, Senators who do not wish to approve an anomaly in our legislative proceedings, should favor the striking out of this provision, or the substitution of the word "joint" for the word "concurrent." We ought not to put a premium on disintegrating the only organization seriously advanced for the purpose of preventing or minimizing the evils of future wars.

Those who are not satisfied with the provision in the treaty and who insist that withdrawal should be made easier, it would seem, should be content that notice of withdrawal should be made in the ordinary legislative process, particularly in view of the fact that the President, under our system of government, is the sole agency for communicating with foreign powers.

Under the reservation as proposed by the majority Congress would assume, contrary to all precedents, the right to deal directly with foreign nations. Congress is without the means and agency of officially familiarizing itself with the proceedings of other Governments and of their intentions and purposes; this aside from any question of constitutional power, which I think is a grave one. This information, under existing methods, can only be obtained through the Executive. Is it not desirable to give the President the power of veto, and thus bring to the attention of Congress reasons that may very powerfully influence his consideration of the subject and which may have their basis in a knowledge of affairs derived from sources of information not open to Congress? Will not the denial of the right of veto or approval by the Executive, under the circumstances, constitute a reflection on the present Executive? Is that the primary purpose of the provision?

Surely no Senator would be prompted by such an influence or consideration. Does any Senator believe that a question of this character should be determined by petulance or personal prejudice? If that is not the purpose of the provision, answer me, somebody who stands sponsor for it, what can be its purpose? Why should Congress, the two Houses of Congress, in an unofficial capacity—for, under the Constitution, if they act in an official capacity they must act either by bill or by joint resolution, which contemplates the signature of the Executive—why should the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, in violation of every precedent of our diplomatic history, assert the right to act unofficially in terminating our relations with foreign Governments under the so-called league of nations?

In dealing with national affairs, in considering and determining any question which may come before the Congress, considerations of personal envy, malice, spite, and prejudice are always disregarded by Senators. Spite and malice toward an individual who by the chances of politics may occupy the position of Chief Magistrate can not justify broad-minded and patriotic Senators, such as we all are, in seeking to discredit or impair the legitimate powers of the Executive or to usurp the powers of the Executive.

I am not asserting that any Senator is consciously or unconsciously moved to support the measure by a purpose to humiliate the present Chief Executive. I merely declare that such motives are unworthy of Senators, and that the subject must be decided on a higher plane; and I inquire what is the motive behind the provision? No Senator has risen to justify it. No explanation is offered to the Senate and to the country and to the world why this extraordinary provision, in striking contrast with other terms of the resolution of ratification contemplating action by joint resolution, is inserted.

In fairness to those who hope that the league of nations may prove beneficial to this Government, in fairness to other nations which enter the league, let us not for any reason make withdrawal so easy that it may be accomplished under impulses inspired by misinformation or under influences which are unfriendly to a fair international establishment for the promotion of cooperation and for the preservation of peace among the nations.

Friends of this treaty, whether for or against reservations, those Senators who desire to see the treaty ratified with or without reasonable reservations ought not to permit this provision to stand unchanged in the reservation. We ought either to carry the pending amendment of the Senator from Colorado or to strike out the word "concurrent" and insert the word "joint," so that before the United States may withdraw from the league of nations the concurrence of the Executive and the two Houses of Congress will be required.

In passing the most trivial legislation within our authority concurrence by the two Houses of Congress and the Executive is required. This league of nations has been assailed from the beginning of the debates in the Senate. Senators, whatever may be your view of its importance or of its probable benefits to mankind, let those who profess themselves in sympathy with its chief principles and purposes take no action such as that which is contemplated in reservation No. 2. Let us at least give to this treaty and to our participation in the league of nations as much sanctity, solemnity, and permanence as we give to legislation enacted by the Congress.

APPENDIX.

[Senate Report No. 97, Thirty-fourth Congress, first session, Apr. 7, 1856.]

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate which is annexed, have had the same under consideration and now report:

The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to consider the expediency of some act of legislation, having the concurrence of both Houses of Congress, by which the treaty with Denmark regulating the payment of Sound dues may be effectively abrogated in conformity with the requirements of the Constitution under which every treaty is a part of 'the supreme law of the land,' and in conformity with the practice of the Government in such cases, and especially to consider whether there be any defect in the notice which has been given which such legislation may be necessary to remedy."

The Senate, in executive session, on the 31 day of March last, adopted the following resolution, as to which the injunction of secrecy has been removed, viz:

"Whereas by the fifth article of the general convention of friendship, commerce, and navigation between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of Denmark, concluded at Washington on the 26th day of April, 1826, it is provided that—

"'Neither the vessels of the United States nor their cargoes shall, when they pass the Sound or the Belts, pay higher or other duties than those which are or may be paid by the most favored nations.'"

Which article has been construed into a concession on the part of the United States of the right on the part of the Government of Denmark to levy duties or tolls on such ships and cargoes burdensome and oppressive to the commerce of the United States in the Baltic Sea and in derogation of common right to the free navigation of open seas.

And it being provided by the eleventh article of the said convention that after 10 years from the date thereof either of the contracting parties should be at liberty to give notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same in the manner therein provided.

With a view, therefore, to relieve the commerce of the United States in the Baltic Sea from the duties or tolls aforesaid:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to give to the Government of Denmark the notice required by the eleventh article of said general convention of the 26th day of April, 1826, for the termination of the same."

And the President, in his annual message at the commencement of the present session, informed Congress that—

"In pursuance of the authority conferred by a resolution of the Senate of the United States passed on the 3d of March last, notice was given to Denmark on the 14th of April of the intention of this Government to avail itself of the stipulation of the subsisting convention of friendship, commerce, and navigation between that Kingdom and the United States, whereby either party might, after 10 years, terminate the same at the expiration of one year from the date of notice for that purpose."

The convention spoken of in the message of the President and referred to in the resolution of the Senate is the "general convention of friendship, commerce, and navigation between the United States and His Majesty the King of Denmark," concluded at Washington on the 26th day of April, 1826, and promulgated by proclamation of the President on the 14th of October following. It is, as its title imports, a convention affecting commerce and navigation only between the two countries. No legislation was necessary to carry it into effect, nor has any been had.

The eleventh article of the convention is in the following words:

"The present convention shall be in force for 10 years from the date hereof, and further until the end of one year after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same, each of the contracting parties reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other at the end of said term of 10 years; and it is hereby agreed between them that on the expiration of one year after such notice shall have been received by either from the other party this convention and all the provisions thereof shall altogether cease and determine."

The resolution of the Senate directing the committee to consider "the expediency of some act of legislation" by which the convention with Denmark may be "effectively abrogated in conformity with the requirements of the Constitution under which every treaty is a part of the 'supreme law of the land,'" would seem to direct this inquiry as interesting only to this Government or to its citizens—that is to say, the resolution is construed to assume that the notice which has been given is effectual to terminate the convention as between the two Governments when the period limited for such termination shall expire, and requires the committee to consider, as a domestic question, whether this convention, although abrogated so far as Denmark is concerned by the notice which has been given, yet, being "the supreme law of the land," some act of legislation by Congress may not be necessary to repeal or to annul it as such law. At least such is the construction placed by the committee on the resolution—that whether such legislation be necessary or no, as to Denmark the treaty is at an end when the time limited by the notice shall expire.

But as to this convention, and all others of like character, the committee are clear in the opinion that it is competent for the President and Senate, acting together, to terminate it in the manner prescribed by the eleventh article without the aid or intervention of legislation by Congress, and that when so terminated it is at an end to every intent, both as a contract between the Governments and as a law of the land.

By the Constitution of the United States the whole power to make treaties is vested in the President and Senate. In Article II, section 2, granting power to the President, it provides that—

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

The question then presented by the resolution is, after a treaty is so made, where power is reserved by it to either party to terminate it on notice, can the treaty-making power give such notice, or is it such an exercise of political power as to require the concurrence of the House of Representatives through the forms of legislation?

A treaty between nations has its sanction, by international law, in the good faith of the contracting parties, added to which, in this country, it becomes "the supreme law of the land," and thus, to our own citizens, it is further clothed with the obligations of domestic law.

To violate a treaty, it is agreed among civilized nations, is the highest breach of national faith—which is national honor—and is justly declared to be sufficient cause of war; or if a treaty be violated or disregarded by one of the parties, the other may hold itself released from its obligation and act accordingly.

There is, of course, no provision to be found in the Constitution assigning power to any department of the Government to abrogate or annul existing treaties; and yet occasions may arise where the national honor as well as safety may require the Government to hold itself and its citizens released from treaty obligations by declaring such treaties null. Such an occasion was presented in our relations with France in 1798, and it was then determined that Congress, by law, could, for the reasons assigned in the preamble to this act, declare the treaties with that power at an end.

It was a hostile act, as the preamble shows, and was looked upon at the time as the precursor of war, if not an act of war itself. There was no provision in the treaties with France to terminate them at the will of the contracting parties, and hence, as well to preserve the honor of the country as to resent the injurious conduct of France, there was no alternative but to declare war or to declare the treaties null.

So far as "the practice of the Government in such cases"—in the language of the resolution—is concerned, the committee can find but two instances in which treaties have been annulled or abrogated.

The first is the case referred to, of the treaties with France annulled in 1798.

The second is the case of the convention with England of August, 1827, annulled by notice provided for in the convention itself, similar to that in the treaty with Denmark now under consideration.

The mode in which the Government acted would, in both cases, seem to have been the same, inasmuch as both have the sanction of law—that is to say, in the case with France the treaties were, by law, declared no longer "legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States"; and in the case with England, Congress, by law, authorized the President to give the notice for the termination of the convention—yet the committee see the most clear and palpable distinction in the character of the two acts, though both are in the forms of legislation.

The treaties with France contained no reservation of right, to either party, to terminate them at their discretion. The convention with England did contain such reservation.

And whether it be competent or not to the President and Senate, as the treaty-making power, to abrogate treaties where no such right is reserved—a question not necessary to be brought into discussion here—the committee entertain no doubt that where the right to terminate a treaty at discretion is reserved in the treaty itself such discretion resides in the President and Senate.

The distinction in the character of the acts, in the one class of treaties and in the other, consists in this, that in the first class, as in the treaties with France in 1798, they were annulled as to the other contracting party, se invito.

In the second, the case with England, they became null with the assent of that power previously given.

The committee do not consider it necessary to review "the practice of the Government," so far as it was evinced in the case of the French treaties, further than to show that it can not be invoked as a precedent in the matter now before them.

The relations between France and the United States were at the time of the most unfriendly character, as both the contemporaneous legislation and history show; the act annulling the treaties was one of a series of laws, passed at the same session, of hostile import. It was made to rest on the principle of universal law, that where a contract is violated by one party the other is at liberty to regard it at an end as to both.

That act, with its preamble, is as follows:

"Whereas the treaties concluded between the United States and France have been repeatedly violated on the part of the French Government, and the just claims of the United States for reparation of the injuries so committed have been refused, and their attempts to negotiate an amicable adjustment of all complaints between the two nations have been repelled with indignity; and whereas under authority of the French Government there is yet pursued against the United States a system of predatory violence infracting said treaties and hostile to the rights of a free and independent nation:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the United States are of right freed and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaties and the consular convention heretofore concluded between the United States and France, and that the same shall not henceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States."

It is thus manifested that the power here exercised was outside of any treaty stipulation, and while the committee are not called on to decide whether the President and the Senate might not, by their independent action, have annulled these treaties, yet, as a power inherent in all Governments to protect themselves from aggression and wrong, or as one of a series of measures projected and carried into execution to disable an adversary and place him in the wrong in anticipation of war, the committee can well justify the action of the Government, in the case cited, as a rightful exercise of the war power, without viewing it in any manner as a precedent establishing in Congress alone, and under any circumstances, the power to annul a treaty.

But, however this may be where the power annulling a treaty is exercised violentur or against a contracting party se invito, the case is very different where by original stipulation the treaty is to terminate by consent.

To avoid occasions of rupture it has been prudently stipulated, in most of our later treaties, that after a certain period fixed by the treaty either party should have power to terminate them on reasonable notice to the other.

Such were the provisions in the convention with England in 1827 providing for the joint occupation of Oregon by the subjects and citizens of the two powers and in the treaty with Denmark now under consideration.

In the case with England the notice to terminate the treaty was given by President Polk, pursuant to the provisions of a law passed at his recommendation, and it remains to be considered whether this is to be taken as evidence of a practice in the Government inconsistent with the power assumed by the President and the Senate in the case with Denmark.

The third article of the convention with England and the eleventh article of that with Denmark—which has been cited above—are substantially the same, and what is affirmed of the one may be affirmed of the other.

The committee consider that the legal effect of the eleventh article of the treaty with Denmark is that it remains a treaty of perfect obligation for a period of 10 years; after that it becomes a treaty at will, subject to the condition only of 12 months' notice to terminate it. Who is to exercise this will on the part of the United States?

The Constitution determines this. The whole power to bind the Government by treaty is vested in the President and Senate, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring. The treaty in question was created by the will of the treaty-making power, and it contained a reservation by which that will should be revoked or its exercise cease on a stipulated notice. It is thus the will of the treaty-making power which is the subject of revocation, and it follows that the revocation is incident to the will.

The President and Senate could certainly terminate this treaty, or any other, with the consent of the opposite contracting party, by the negotiation of a new treaty in terms annulling it. And what is the present case but such consent, providing in advance for its termination on a contingency and without new negotiations?

The committee are thus satisfied that the notice authorized by the Senate, and given by the President to Denmark, was a proper exercise of the right reserved in the treaty, and that its effect will be to annul the treaty at the expiration of the time limited, both as regards the two Governments and the citizens and subjects of either.

Nor do the committee see that there is anything inconsistent with this in the exercise of a like power in the case of the convention with England concerning the joint occupation of Oregon pursuant to the authority of a law having the concurrence of the House of Representatives instead of an authority derived from the President and Senate alone. Although it be true, as an exercise of constitutional power, that the advice of the Senate alone is sufficient to enable the President to give the notice, it does not follow that the joint assent of the Senate and House of Representatives involves a denial of the separate power of the Senate.

In the case of the Oregon treaty President Polk recommended that both Houses should unite in authorizing the notice. It had become imperiously necessary to prevent collisions between the citizens and subjects of the two powers who were settled in that country, and which might involve their respective Governments, that the boundary should be determined. All efforts to adjust this by negotiation had failed whilst the joint occupation endured. And, in wise diplomacy, the President thought the minds of the two Governments would be more earnestly directed to this end if such joint occupation were terminated. To do this with the assent of both Houses of Congress was certainly calculated to make the act more impressive upon England than if authorized by the Senate alone, and especially as it was known that on the policy of giving the notice at all the Senate was by no means united. The result showed the wisdom of the course pursued by the President.

Instructions modifying the pretensions of the British Government and acceptable to ours, as the basis of a new treaty, were dispatched from England to the British minister at Washington after the notice was received in England, but before it had been delivered to that Government. (The joint resolution authorizing the notice to be given was passed on the 27th of April, 1846. It was received by Mr. McLane, our minister at London, on the 15th of May, with instructions to deliver the notice. On the 19th the new instructions left England for the British minister at Washington, whilst the notice was not delivered until the 21st. The new treaty settling the boundary was signed at Washington on the 15th of June.)

Whilst, therefore, the committee are clear in the opinion that the right to give the notice in question pertains to the treaty-making power, they see nothing in the fact that, in the case with England, the House of Representatives acted with it, from which it is necessarily to be inferred that such union was then considered necessary to perfect the authority. But if it were so intended the committee would not yield to the precedent. They consider the reasoning irrefragable which establishes the right to give this notice in the treaty-making power, and in their judgment it should ever be so maintained.

Then as to the inquiry whether, conceding the notice effectual to terminate the treaty, so far as our relations with Denmark are concerned, legislation is not necessary to repeal or annul it as a part of the "law of the land."

By the sixth article of the Constitution it is declared that—

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

The latter clause of this article is the key to the meaning of its antecedent. Treaties are laws to the nations contracting them. Nor was it intended by this provision to ascribe to them on the part of this Government any greater or higher obligation as between the contracting parties than they imported under the law of nations.

From the peculiar structure of the Federal Government, however, in its relations to the State governments, it was deemed proper and necessary to declare the paramount authority of a treaty if at any time in conflict with a State constitution or laws, a necessity that extended equally to the Federal Constitution and the Federal laws; and accordingly having classed them together, the latter clause of the article declared them also "supreme," and bound the State judges so to administer them, "anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary nothwithstanding."

It may also have been considered as more conducive to the peace of the country by placing them, for domestic purposes, on the general footing of "laws," to make them as such obligatory on the citizen. They are thus brought practically, for domestic purposes, immediately within reach of judicial exposition and to be enforced directly as other laws against the citizen. But it were a capital error to suppose that it is under this provision of the Constitution that a treaty can be abrogated or annulled by law of Congress.

Treaties are contracts resulting from the faith which all civilized nations must, for the peace of the world, repose in each other. To violate them, except on grave and proper consideration and for adequate cause, is not only utterly dishonoring to the offending party but may be taken as cause of war. No statesman would venture to justify before a foreign power the abrogation of a treaty by quoting a supposed right to do so reserved in this article of the Constitution.

In the instance cited, that of the act of 1798, declaring the treaties with France no longer obligatory on the United States, no reference was had to this article of the Constitution. But, on the contrary, those treaties were so declared null exclusively on the ground that they had "been repeatedly violated on the part of the French Government," and that "the French Government yet pursued against the United States a system of predatory violence infracting the said treaties."

The committee, on the whole, conclude that so far as the "practice of the Government" is concerned there is nothing to question the sufficiency of the notice that has been given to Denmark to terminate the treaty, and they recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the notice which has been given by the President to Denmark, pursuant to the resolution of the Senate of March 3, 1855, to terminate the treaty with that power of the 26th of April, in the year 1826, is sufficient to cause such treaty to terminate and be annulled, to all intents whatsoever, pursuant to the eleventh article thereof, and that no other or further act of legislation is necessary to put an end to said treaty as part of the law of the land."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, one remarkable phase of this discussion develops from time to time. I am glad to hear, even casually, the Constitution of the United States mentioned by some of my colleagues, even if it is only to appeal to the form of that formerly venerated document; even if it is only to appeal to it as one of the great autocrats of recent years, the president of a so-called republic upon this hemisphere appealed to his constitution. He reelected himself despite the terms of the constitution. He had the constitution changed whenever he pleased. He had no regard for the substance or the meaning or the spirit of the constitution, but I do not know of any case in his long career in which he did not appeal to the form of the constitution in some way, even if he had to change the form to meet his then needs or necessities.

Mr. President, some of our colleagues apparently proceed upon the theory that the presidential office is not only a great office, in some respects the greatest in the world, but that the occupant of that office, immediately upon lifting his hand and taking the oath of office, becomes imbued with powers almost omniscient. A lawyer who could not command a $100 fee when elected to the Presidency at once, to the minds of many of our fellow citizens, acquires by the oath of office more legal knowledge than was ever combined in Blackstone, John Marshall, and all of the prominent law writers and law practitioners and law expounders and lawgivers of the world.

I have as much respect for the presidential office as I have for the senatorial office. They are both constitutional offices. They are representative of two equal branches of the Government. Neither is superior to the other. I have no more respect for the presidential office than I have for the senatorial office.

The Senator who just concluded his most eloquent appeal or speech desired to know what was behind this proposition, and stated that no Senator dared to rise here and explain what was behind it. My explanation may not be satisfactory, Mr. President. The explanation that I make may not appeal to the judgment of the Senator who has just spoken, but I shall give it without any hesitation whatever. I shall say very frankly, the President of the United States being represented upon the council of the league of nations, the President of the United States being represented by his appointee upon the league itself or in the assembly, we having entered a common council where he is represented, becoming members nationally of a league through the representative to be appointed by him, the coordinate branch of this Government has exactly the same constitutional right and power and authority to say when they shall get out of it as it has to say when and how they shall get into it.

The Senate of the United States is now making or unmaking the treaty under their constitutional authority. If, as they shall send it to him, the President of the United States does not see fit to ratify it, he can take the responsibility. If we fail to put into it what we think should be in it, because of some idea that the present or some future occupant of the White House may not like it, then we are shirking our duty and failing to perform our duty under the oaths which we have taken.

We propose to provide, if we can, that he shall not appoint a member of the council or of the league until Congress shall have made provision for them. I shall vote for that provision.

Then he has a member of the league and a member of the council representing him, and now we are told that the Congress of the United States, coming from the people of the United States, should not have the right, by a concurrent resolution, to provide how we should get out of it, but, as was said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], we must avail ourselves of the article of the Constitution providing for the impeachment of the President of the United States if he does not get out when the Congress thinks he should.

The proposition to me, Mr. President, is one that is just as plain upon my side of it as it is to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] or any other Senator from his standpoint. I want to say—and I am accustomed to speaking out in meeting—this part of the proposed reservation was written by a Democrat, one of the prominent Democratic Senators, and was brought to the Committee on Foreign Relations and adopted by Democratic and Republican votes, and so reported out. We have been denounced for being partisan in this matter, but, as I said, the author of this particular provision was a prominent Democratic Senator, and he will vote for it, as will other Democrats, I think. He is one of those who believe, as I do, that the Congress of the United States, supreme in its sphere, and the Senate, supreme in this particular matter in its sphere, have the right to demand and receive the respect for their orders and directions as the President of the United States or any other living human being or any other branch of a Government has a right to demand respect in the performance of his duties.

I shall vote for this reservation because I believe that the President of the United States has nothing to do with it. I shall vote for it because I believe that the Congress of the United States, by a concurrent resolution, if necessary, over the protest and contrary to the judgment of the representatives of the executive department upon the council and the league, shall have a right to get the United States out of the league. It is not necessary that the President should join in the adoption of a notice to get out of something which we get into by action of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, so far as the personality of the President of the United States is concerned, I can say, sir, that it does not enter into my consideration of this matter nor influence my vote in any manner whatsoever, except to this point. I say very frankly that the present occupant of the White House entertains such ideas of Government that I have not the confidence in him that would justify me in leaving the fate of the United States in his hands alone. I believe that this is a government of laws, and he believes, as he believed in 1878 and said, that it is a government of men. This is the distinction.

But Senators upon the other side or Senators upon this side opposing this reservation seem to think it necessary that those supporting such a reservation must have some political animus. I want to fix this matter now for the present President and any President who may succeed him. Because of the experience which we have had with this President I fear the Presidents who may come after him. That is possibly frank enough. The whole fate of this great country of ours rests upon what we are doing now, in my judgment, and I propose, in so far as I can, to see that the people's direct representatives in the Congress of the United States shall have the right to say when we shall get out of this iniquitous, nefarious scheme, as the Senate has the power to say when and how we shall get into it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, as the discussion was in a way precipitated by myself, I desire to say a few words in relation to some of the suggestions that have been made in opposition to the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] apparently put his opposition to the motion to strike out this provision in reservation No. 2 upon the ground that it was not legislative in character, but executive. I regret very much that the Senator from Georgia is not here.

All governmental authority, Mr. President, is divided into three classes—legislative, executive, and judicial. Obviously the matter of getting out of the league does not fall within the domain of the judicial.

The Executive enforces the law. The President of the United States is sworn to see that the laws are faithfully executed. What law is the President executing in determining that the United States shall no longer be a member of the league, and giving notice accordingly? Finally, Mr. President, let us test it upon the question as to what is legislative authority. Is it legislative in character?

Mr. President, a treaty is a law. In making treaties we are making laws. In changing those treaties, we are making laws. We decide, however it is done, to get out of the league, and we give a notice accordingly. Evidently to-day the law is, as provided in article 10 of the covenant, that we go to the aid of any member of the league against which any acts of external aggression are directed threatening its territorial integrity or political independence. To-morrow, after the notice has been appropriately given, the law is entirely different. We are under no obligation then to go to their aid.

Under article 15, should any member engage in war contrary to the covenant of the league, all relations between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the other members of the league are interdicted, and they become illegal. If Greece should go to war contrary to the provisions of the league, as said some time ago by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], every American citizen would be denied an opportunity to carry on any business transactions of any character with a Greek national. We are in the league to-day, and it is perfectly legal to do business with a Greek citizen. We are out of the league to-morrow, and it is entirely unlawful to do business with him. Accordingly, who can doubt that the determination to withdraw from the league and the giving of notice in accordance with that determination is in its nature legislative?

But, Mr. President, as I have indicated, this does not contemplate the mere physical operation of giving the notice. By no means. It involves the transcendentally important question of determining whether we shall remain in the league or not, a matter obviously affecting in the most serious way the future of our country as well as the future of the world. It is not so much a question as to who shall do the physical act; the question is, In whom shall we repose this awful charge of determining whether we shall remain a member of the league, with all its obligations and whatever benefits may accrue by reason of membership, or free ourselves entirely from those obligations and surrender whatever benefits there may be? I do not believe that it can be seriously doubted that this contemplates legislative action.

I now desire to address myself to the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to myself or to the Senator from Colorado on yesterday, and again this morning introduced into the discussion by a question from the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] as to whether an act could not be passed which would cease to take effect and have force upon the occurrence of some future contingency.

Mr. President, this reservation does not contemplate our withdrawal from the league, a severance of our relation as a member of the league, upon the occurrence of some fortuitous event in the future. I do not undertake to say that that would not be possible. Moreover, it does not even depend upon the question or determination or the existence of a certain fact or certain condition, upon the determination of which we are to withdraw from the league.

The Senator from Oklahoma referred to numerous acts of Congress passed during the war period which were to cease to have effect whenever the President of the United States should determine and make proclamation that the war had ceased or that demobilization had been completed. That likewise can be done. A law may be enacted, of course, to take effect and remain in force and effect until some official shall determine as a matter of fact that a certain fact or condition exists.

The subject was very carefully considered by the Supreme Court in the case of Field against Clark, which will be in the minds of most Senators. They will recall that that court considered a reciprocity provision of a tariff act under which the President was authorized to make proclamation that some other country had so reduced its rates of duty concerning the admission of our products into that country as to fall within the provisions of the statute, and then that lower rates would go into effect. After considering many statutes of like character, the Supreme Court said:

> But when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions, reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, were imposed upon the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring the suspension as to that country which Congress had determined should occur. He had no discretion in the premises except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of a policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact it can not be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation in obedience to the legislative will he exercised the function of making laws.

So if this provision were to the effect that whenever the President determined a certain fact or certain condition existed he was then authorized to give notice, it would not be unexceptional. But that is not the case. The question of giving notice involves the very highest degree of discretion and the exercise of the most profound judgment and all relating to the question of the good or the ill of our country as it shall remain in or sever its connection with the league.

When it becomes a matter addressed to the discretion, to the judgment, to the wisdom, of doing or not doing the act, then as a matter of course it becomes a question of legislation and not a mere determination of the existence of a fact or condition, upon which the act is to go into effect or is to cease to have any effect.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire if that is not true with reference to all our treaties, which provide that they may be terminated after a given time upon notice by either party? It is not a question for the Executive solely to give notice, but it requires legislative action on the part of Congress. For instance, permit me to call the Senator's attention, just as an illustration, to our treaty with Cuba, which provides that "it shall continue in force for the term of five years from the date of going into effect, and from year to year thereafter until the expiration of one year from the date when either of the contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same." Under that provision, is it not the Senator's view that an act of Congress is required before notice shall be authorized or given so as to terminate the treaty?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not any doubt at all; I do not believe anybody here, who thinks about the matter at all, can consider that that contemplated anything else or that any other method would be a valid method, except that it would be a further exercise of the treaty-making power. In other words, it takes a law to repeal a law. There is no doubt about that proposition, and so far as a treaty is concerned it may be repealed, so far as we are concerned, by an act of Congress or it may be repealed by another act of the treaty-making power.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator makes that statement so confidently that I wish to ask him whether he has examined the textbook writers and writers on international law upon the subject?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does he find any such doctrine in any of them?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Will he cite them?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator does not expect me to cite them offhand.

Mr. LENROOT. I have some directly to the contrary, and that is why I asked the question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have very carefully studied the matter of negotiating treaties.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me while I read just a paragraph from Willoughby?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no objection to the Senator reading it.

Mr. LENROOT. I am reading from Willoughby on Treaties:

> Though the Senate participates in the ratification of treaties, the President has the authority, without asking for senatorial advice and consent, to denounce an existing treaty and to declare it no longer binding upon the United States. In important cases, however, he would undoubtedly seek senatorial approval before taking action. But whether or not this approval be sought, the courts hold themselves bound by the denunciation, the existence or nonexistence of a treaty being a political question the decision upon which by the political departments of the Government is binding upon the judicial departments.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I remember that very well, and that brings me to a discussion now of that question. I do not undertake to say at this time whether the actual concurrence of the two bodies, the two branches of the Government, the executive and the legislative, in denouncing or abrogating a treaty, is essential, but I do undertake to say that the action of the Executive in the matter is indispensable.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] this morning laid down the doctrine that it is within the power of the Executive of his own motion and upon his own judgment, uninfluenced and unguided by any action of Congress, to terminate a treaty whenever he sees fit. If the President of the United States has any such power, he has it by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. If he has the power by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, how can the Congress take it away from him, or how can the President and the Senate to-day take it away from the President who may be President 5 or 10 years from now, and lodge the power in the two Houses of Congress?

If the Senator from Missouri is correct, this provision in the reservation is obnoxious not only upon the ground to which I have referred, but it is obnoxious upon another ground, that the sole power is reposed by the Constitution in the President of the United States, and this is an effort to rob him of his constitutional power. Reference has been made, and eloquently made, to the wisdom of the fathers who provided that in reference to all matters of legislation the concurrence of the Congress and of the President was requisite, or in the event that the President did not concur that the matter should have the approval of two-thirds of both Houses.

The opponents of the treaty have repeatedly on this floor extolled the wisdom of the founders of our Government and the framers of our Constitution, and very justly, for it has been rightly said that it is the greatest instrument every struck off at one time by the heart or the hand of man. They provided that in every trivial matter of legislation the concurrence of the Congress and the President was requisite. We are not able to give force or effect to our views that a bridge ought to be built across the Missouri River without submitting the matter to the President for his approbation or disapprobation.

But here is a question affecting vitally, as I have indicated, the future not only of our country but of all the world, and it is proposed with respect to that to reverse the teachings of the founders of the Government and repose the power in the Congress alone.

The framers of the Constitution were profound students of history. They knew, from the experience of other nations, of the peril that lay in reposing these weighty matters in the legislative body without any kind of check whatever from the Executive. They were guided by their own experience under the Articles of Confederation, where they tried the system of legislating and entering into treaties without any check whatever from the Executive. They found it had not worked very successfully, and they believed they had devised the system, and they declared their purpose in most unequivocal language in the section of Article I, to which I invited the attention of the Senate on yesterday, that it was unwise to allow any action involving the exercise of judgment as to what course the country ought to take, what laws ought to govern it, without the concurrence of the Executive in any conclusion that might be arrived at either by both Houses in legislative matters or by the Senate in relation to treaties.

But here is a subject that lies peculiarly within the domain in which the Executive may be deemed to have peculiar knowledge, superior as a rule to that which the Members of both Houses may have. The President under our system is the agency through which all foreign communications and negotiations are carried on. He is charged by his office to keep informed concerning foreign matters and our relations to foreign countries. He is provided by the law with numerous agencies through which he is kept advised concerning those matters. And yet, as I said, although we can not pass even a trivial bridge bill without his approbation, it is proposed to submit this important matter to him without getting the benefit of such information as he may have under the advantages which surround him concerning our foreign relations.

To illustrate, it will be recalled that when the Fiume controversy was at its most critical point, and the conditions were exceedingly tense, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in a published interview declared his opposition to the attitude of the President upon that question and asserted that Italy was entitled to Fiume. Now, the Senator from Massachusets has had a very wide experience in public affairs, he has long been a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, he has been a profound student of European politics, and he may be right about that.

But, Mr. President, I have no information as to what peculiar opportunities he has had to acquaint himself with the indirect conditions that surround the question of the disposition of Fiume. I know that the President of the United States was in constant communication upon that subject with Admiral Niblack, who commanded the allied fleets in the Adriatic; I know that he had the benefit of intimate communication with our ambassador at Rome; and I know that he could command secret and confidential reports from all of our consular officers in every city in Italy. I have no doubt that he had experts at his command, who studied the subject on the ground; and whatever may be the extent of the information which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] may have upon the subject—and I have no doubt in the world that it is exceedingly ample—I am myself disposed to believe that the President knew a great deal more about the matter than I did or than many other Senators did, and, I might easily say, very much more than the majority of the Members of either branch of Congress happened to know about it. Accordingly, Mr. President, it seems to me, considering all things, and the likelihood that there will be a change some time or other in the Presidency of the United States, that we ought not upon such a grave matter as this to exclude the President from the consideration as to whether this far-reaching and radical change in our relations with the other nations of the earth should go into effect.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yeld.

Mr. CUMMINS. Without any suggestion in regard to the wisdom or unwisdom of excluding the President from participation in the conclusion with respect to withdrawing from the treaty, does the Senator from Montana concede that we can exclude him?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is a point on which I should like to have some light from the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to shed any light I can on the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana has very often, and generally with my entire concurrence, analyzed the pending treaty with respect to amendments and reservations and the necessity of securing the assent of those who have already sanctioned it. The Senator has no doubt, I assume, that in case of an agreement between individuals, for instance, in the case of an agreement of partnership between individuals—and this treaty creates a partnership of nations—the parties to such partnership could provide that it should terminate upon notice given by a third party having no interest whatever in the partnership. That would be entirely within the competence of the parties to the agreement, would it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it not entirely within the competence of the United States, in entering this partnership of nations, to stipulate that it shall be dissolved upon or through the will of some other party than the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should say not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why have we not the constitutional power to agree with the other nations of the world that if the treaty becomes distasteful, say, to the State of New York, upon the passage of a resolution declaring that opinion, the partnership shall cease?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am glad to say to the Senator what I think about that. I do not think it would be possible at all to do that, and for the very plain reason that the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States are the mere agents of the Government of the United States. The President of the United States and the Congress of the United States have been intrusted with these grave duties. The man who is now President and the Congress which now sits are intrusted with the grave duty at this time. The President who will sit 10 years from now and the Congress that will be in existence at that time will be intrusted with the grave duty as it shall arise at that time. We can not throw those responsibilities upon anybody else; they are reposed by the people in us. We can not delegate them. The people having said, "We rely upon you to exercise your judgment, to reach a determination upon your information and upon your wisdom," we can not put it off and say, "Although it rests with us by appointment of the people to put an end to this treaty by an act of Congress any time we see fit, we turn that over to the Legislature of New York and let them exercise the judgment for us."

Before the Senator from Iowa came in, if he will pardon me, I was calling attention to the fact that a statute or a treaty might end upon the occurrence of a fortuitous event or upon the determination of a certain fact or of a certain condition by a certain officer, he having no discretion on the subject at all; but when it becomes a question of the exercise of his judgment or his discretion about whether the law should remain in force or whether it should be repealed, considering the good of the country, that would be an unlawful delegation of legislative power. The Senator's question is whether we could delegate power to the Legislature of the State of New York.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the President and the Senate alone are concerned in the contract which we make.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. CUMMINS. Congress has nothing whatever to do with it; and the position of the Senator from Montana, therefore, is that while it does not require the concurrence of Congress and the President to create the obligation, it does require the concurrence of Congress and the President to put an end to the obligation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; by no means, Mr. President. The treaty can be ended just exactly as it is created. Undoubtedly we could negotiate another treaty by which we would withdraw from the league, and I do not undertake to say that the treaty originally could not repose in the President and two-thirds of the Senate the opportunity and right to withdraw; but there is another way by which we can get rid of the treaty so far as we are concerned. We can get rid of the treaty at any time by act of Congress. The Senator will realize, of course, that that has been determined over and over again.

Now, the other countries parties to this treaty have consented that it shall be abrogated pro tanto in any way that the Government of the United States sees fit to abrogate it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator's position, then, is that once the abrogation is created, nothing less or other than the Government of the United States, composed of Congress and the President, can end it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Wisconsin has called attention to a statement in Willoughby which seems to indicate that the President of the United States alone can abrogate a treaty; but I should want to examine the question with very great care before I could accept any such doctrine. Other than that the Senator has stated it correctly.

Now, just a word more, Mr. President. This provision inserted here—and we might as well be frank about the matter—is simply an indication of a want of confidence in the man who at the present time happens to be Chief Executive of the United States; at least, as said by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], the experience had with the present Executive of the United States has filled Senators with apprehension about the acts of future Presidents.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that nine out of ten letters I get in protest against this treaty breathe a spirit of intense hatred of Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, and I am led to believe that that feeling forms a very large element in the opposition to this treaty; but I am astounded that Senators of the United States should allow considerations of that character to influence their judgment. Mr. Wilson has been President of the United States now for almost seven years. Our history extends back for 125 years and more, and we hope that it will extend for many hundreds of years into the future. Apparently nothing in our past history prior to the time that he became Chief Executive has prompted any statesman to attempt to take this power out of the hands of the President of the United States, and I think that it is stretching the point to the limit of attenuation to take the position that our experience with the present administration has been such as to admonish us that it is unwise to permit the President of the United States to participate with Congress in the all-important duty the nature of which we are now considering.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I first wish to call attention to a portion of the remarks made yesterday by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], in which he used this language:

> Mr. President, I for one have done everything in my power to keep this question out of the mire of politics and partisanship. I think the question is too big to be made a partisan question. I do not care what my animosity toward the President of the United States may be because of any subject or because of any action on his part; I do not want that to influence me in entering into an agreement with the great nations of the world—an agreement intended to preserve the peace of the world. I am satisfied that if we had a Republican President to-day we would not be insisting that he should be eliminated from any voice in the matter of any future action that we might take in respect to either staying in or getting out of this league of nations.

Mr. President, it is very unfortunate that there are some Senators who attribute motives of partisanship to those who happen to differ with them upon any question, and sometimes seem to arrogate to themselves all of the patriotism with reference to the consideration of this important question. We all know that the Senator from North Dakota is patriotic, is devoted to the interests of his country; and yet, if some of us should be as ungenerous as he, one might point to the fact that in reading some of the Senator's speeches, if they did not know his patriotism as we do, they might conclude that he sometimes seemed to be a little more concerned for the interests of the British Empire than he was for those of the United States. We know that that is not so; but I do say that no Senator ought upon this floor to attribute unworthy motives to another Senator, especially when the Senator from North Dakota, being a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, knows that the proposition now before the Senate did not originate with any Republican. It originated with a Democrat. It was suggested to the Committee on Foreign Relations by a Democrat who has always been one of the stanchest supporters of President Wilson, but who has fulfilled his obligations as a Senator of the United States to think independently and act independently upon questions that come before the Senate.

The Senator from North Dakota asks, Why is there a different procedure proposed in this reservation for a concurrent resolution than with reference to other reservations, such as the reservation in regard to article 10, where we propose that a joint resolution or an act of Congress shall be the procedure?

The answer is very plain, Mr. President. In every other case in these proposed reservations where an act of Congress or a joint resolution is required it is the only method in which the Government could obligate itself. In every other case it is assuming obligations upon the part of the Government of the United States. In most of the other cases where we ask for the joint action of the Congress and the President of the United States it means the lives of American boys; it means appropriations, perhaps, of billions of dollars of money; and there is the best of reasons, wherever an obligation is to be assumed by the United States, that there should be joint action.

But what is the situation with reference to this reservation? Here it is proposed only that the United States should relieve itself of obligations that are imposed by this treaty; in other words, that it may get out of this league of nations. No new obligations are imposed upon the United States by this action. It merely relieves the United States from obligations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator, of course, is one of the supporters of this treaty and a supporter of the league of nations. Are we to understand that it is his view that no benefits whatever are conferred upon the United States by this treaty; that it imposes obligations only, without any reciprocal advantages?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not so contend. I thought I made myself clear.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I tried to follow the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. If the United States ever withdraws from this treaty, it does not by the act of withdrawal assume any new obligations imposed upon the people of the United States; while, with reference to the other reservations, where an act or joint resolution is required, it will impose new obligations upon the United States. I thought I made the distinction clear.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; the Senator did, perfectly; but we also surrender whatever advantages we have by membership, do we not?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but that has nothing to do with the distinction I make, where in one case we are assuming obligations and in the other we are relieving ourselves from obligations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator again, Is it not just as important that we should not incautiously surrender advantages as that we should escape obligations?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, I think there is a very great difference, both as to our constitutional power and as to the policy to be invoked. We might well be willing with less caution to surrender certain benefits growing out of a given situation, and it would be a very different situation than to impose upon ourselves new obligations arising out of a certain situation.

That brings us to the proposition, Is this a legislative act? I contend that it is not, both under the precedents read by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] this afternoon and the admission of the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] made yesterday; and if it is not a legislative act, it is perfectly competent for us to insert in the treaty a provision that this notice may be given by concurrent resolution.

Now, is it a legislative act under the Constitution that requires the signature of the President?

I read, in an interruption with the Senator from Montana a little while ago, a paragraph from Willoughby on the Constitution, and because of its very great importance I want to read it again:

> Though the Senate participates in the ratification of treaties, the President has the authority, without asking for senatorial advice and consent, to denounce an existing treaty and to declare it no longer binding upon the United States. In important cases, however, he would undoubtedly seek senatorial approval before taking action. But whether or not this approval be sought, the courts hold themselves bound by the denunciaton, the existence or nonexistence of a treaty being a political question the decision upon which by the political departments of the Government is binding upon the judicial departments.

That is the opinion of one of the authorities of this country upon the Constitution of the United States; and if he is correct in this, it is an Executive power and not a legislative one; and that is corroborated by the precedents and reports read by the Senator from Arkansas, every one of which sustained the position that the committee has taken with reference to this matter. Every precedent read by the Senator from Arkansas was to the effect that while it was questionable whether the President alone had the power to give the notice of the denunciation of a treaty, unquestionably when the Senate concurred in that notice it was a valid notice. If that be true, Mr. President, is it not equally clear that this is not an exercise of a legislative power, but, if it be anything more than an Executive act, it is an exercise of the treaty-making power, and Congress, as such, has nothing whatever to do with it?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. I have not had the pleasure of listening to all that the Senator has said. Has the Senator indicated upon what part of the Constitution that power rests? And if I may submit another interrogation I should be very glad to do so.

Suppose we should enter into a treaty with some power which involved continuing obligations, and there were mutual obligations, but certainly material obligations upon the part of the United States. Does the Senator think that the President of the United States, of his own volition, could terminate that treaty, which called for continuing obligations for an indefinite period, and not subject himself to some punishment or impeachment? In other words, is there no way by which the Government might protect itself and its honor and carry out the contract which it had entered into?

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senate of the United States concluded at any time that the President had no such power and was a usurper, of course impeachment could be resorted to. There is no question about that; but I know of no way in which the action of the Executive could be controlled otherwise than by impeachment. The decisions are clear that the courts will not take jurisdiction of such a question, because the courts invariably say that this is a political question and not a judicial one. But while Willoughby does not attempt in his work to go into the reasons for his conclusion, I think it is very apparent upon what it must rest, and that is this: That while the Executive has the power to make treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate, after all the President is the final treaty-making power. He negotiates the treaty; the Senate advises and consents; and, nevertheless, although we consent, either conditionally or otherwise, it is at the option of the Executive whether that treaty ever has breathed into it the breath of life, because he may, following the action of the Senate, refuse to deposit the ratifications, may refuse to complete the treaty; and the President, being the final treaty-making power, the theory must be that he, having the power alone to complete the treaty, he alone has the power, unless controlled in some way by the treaty itself or by action of Congress abrogating the treaty, to denounce it. I am speaking now only of treaties that have in them provisions for their termination.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a further inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the insertion of a provision in the treaty limiting the President's power so that he could not denounce the treaty without the consent of the Senate or of the Congress would be an infringement of his constitutional right?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not, because if such a provision is inserted in a treaty the President himself then joins in carrying on the treaty to completion with that mode of termination; and he, together with the Senate, being the whole treaty-making power, they may make any provisions that they see fit to make with reference to the terms and conditions under which a treaty may be terminated, and those terms and conditions, being embodied in the treaty itself, will be valid.

Mr. KING. One other question, if the Senator will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. If the Senator's contention is right that the Executive has the power to denounce a treaty whenever he pleases—if there is no limitation upon that authority in the Constitution, but, upon the contrary, that is his right—does not the Senator think that it would be an infringement upon the right of the Executive for us to impose obligations in a treaty that would extend beyond the term of the President who negotiated the treaty, so as to bind the hands of his successor?

Mr. LENROOT. No; not any more than I think the Senator would deny that it would be perfectly competent to provide in the treaty that it should be terminated at some future time upon the occurrence of some event. The situation is exactly the same.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, this is not inserting anything in the treaty. It is putting into the resolution of ratification a reservation that notice of withdrawal by the United States shall be valid if given by concurrent resolution. Has the Senator any doubt that it would be perfectly competent for us to insert as a reservation in the resolution of ratification, to be accepted by at least three of the other powers, a provision that notice, so far as this country was concerned, of its intention to withdraw, should be sufficient if there were filed by the Secretary of the Senate in the office of the secretariat of the league a certified copy of a resolution of the Senate desiring to withdraw?

Mr. LENROOT. There can not be the slightest doubt upon that.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, it seems to me, if we want to write such a provision into the treaty, that the ultimate act which gives the treaty validity is the exchange of ratifications by the President, whereby he approves and ratifies and binds himself by that act.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly.

Mr. KNOX. While I am on my feet, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the question in the Russian case. In 1911 there was an agitation for the abrogation of the Russian treaty on the ground that American passports had been dishonored in Russia, and the House passed a resolution, I think, by a vote with only one in the negative to denounce that treaty. It came over to the Senate, I remember distinctly, on a Thursday, and the Senate was disposed to pass a resolution at once, without referring it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. We managed, through the then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the late Senator Cullom, to get the Senate to postpone consideration of it from Thursday until the following Monday. Meanwhile, on the 17th day of December, the President himself, without Congress having acted at all, denounced the treaty in accordance with its terms, gave notice, as provided by the treaty, that the treaty should terminate; and while it is true that five or six days later the Congress, by joint resolution, ratified and confirmed the act of the President, they recognized the validity of the act of the President in denouncing the treaty in accordance with its terms.

Mr. LENROOT. That is my understanding, that in that very case notice was given by the President without any authority from Congress, and he proceeded upon the assumption that, as the Executive, there being nothing to the contrary in the treaty itself, he had the right to give the notice of the denunciation of the treaty.

However, Mr. President, the material proposition now, so far as we are concerned, is not whether the President has that power independently of any provision in the treaty, but whether the passing of this concurrent resolution is a legislative act which would require the signature of the President.

Yesterday I asked the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] this question:

> I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if the treaty had provided in express terms that the notice shall be given by the President of the United States whether he thinks it would have been valid if ratified by the Senate?
> Mr. WALSH of Montana. I dare say it would.

In other words, Mr. President, the Senator from Montana admits that it would be perfectly competent for us to provide in this treaty that notice of withdrawal may be given by the President of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Wisconsin must not understand that in answering the question as I did I gave any virtue whatever to the declaration in the treaty. That power would be properly exercised in that way, in my judgment, without any reference to the provision in the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then I want to ask the Senator from Montana which position he now takes. Is this an Executive power or a legislative function?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt about it being a legislative power.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is a legislative power, how, then, could it be exercised by the President without express authority?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Because the President is participant in the exercise of the legislative powers of the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator contend that the President may, by himself, exercise any legislative authority?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In so far as he can abrogate a treaty he can exercise legislative authority.

Mr. LENROOT. Where does he get it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He gets it from the Constitution. He can not get it from anywhere else.

Mr. LENROOT. As a part of the legislative power, does the Senator contend?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As a part of the treaty-making power.

Mr. LENROOT. I asked the Senator a fair question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator answers the question fairly. The treaty-making power is a legislative power; that is to say, treaties are laws; and, of course, those who make laws exercise legislative power.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. I am very glad, then, that we have the Senator's position; and it seems to me very clear that he has now admitted himself entirely out of court upon that proposition, because if that is an exercise of power, whatever he may term it, under the treaty-making power, then the Senate and the President acting together may make any sort of provision for the giving of this notice that we choose, call it legislative power if you will. But a concurrent resolution carrying out the terms of a treaty, relating to termination, is not the exercise of legislative power under the Constitution that requires the signature of the President, if the President and the Senate declare that the notice may be given by a concurrent resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator further yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator may draw his own conclusion as to whether I have admitted myself out of court or not. I thought I made it perfectly clear that we can not now, by anything we do, take away any power from future Presidents or from future Congresses.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The power to dispose of the treaty is reposed either in the President or in the President in conjunction with the Senate or in the President in conjunction with the Congress. We can not make any provision whatever that will derogate from those powers in future Presidents and future Congresses.

Mr. LENROOT. I readily admit that. With this concurrent resolution phrased "adopted as a part of this resolution," it may well be that the President will have independent power to give the notice. It certainly would be in Congress, as Congress could by legislative act abrogate the entire treaty. But that would not be at all in conflict with a provision for its abrogation in some other way in addition. I contend that we might insert in this treaty a provision for the giving of the notice of withdrawal by a member of the council, or whoever might happen to be the representative of the United States in this league, because so doing the Senate and the President would have consented to that as one of the conditions under which this treaty might be terminated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he concurs in the opinion stated by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], to the effect that Congress could pass an act in which it was provided that it shall remain in force and effect until the two Houses, by concurrent resolution, provide otherwise?

Mr. LENROOT. I very much doubt that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad to hear the Senator so express himself.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, what is proposed here? It is proposed to provide one method of giving notice of withdrawal; that is all. If we have the power in the treaty to say that the President of the United States may give the notice, if he does not otherwise have it, we certainly have the power to say that Congress, by a concurrent resolution, may give the notice. I think we would have the power to say that the representative of the United States in the league of nations may at any time give the notice, because the President and the Senate would then have agreed, when the ratification of this treaty is deposited, that this would be one of the methods of the termination of the treaty, or that part of it relating to the league of nations, so that, Mr. President, I feel entirely clear that this is a perfectly valid exercise of power for the termination of the treaty.

Now, as to the policy of it. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I have not entertained one thought of partisanship with reference to my view upon this question. I have no idea that if this treaty is ratified, and we go into this league of nations, we will withdraw, or there will be an attempt to withdraw, during the existing term of the present President of the United States. In addition to that, Mr. President, I have every reason to believe that if the time shall come when we desire to withdraw from this league we will have a Republican President of the United States. So there can not be any thought of partisanship in connection with this question.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, I think that it ought not to depend upon the will of one man as to whether the United States should withdraw from the league of nations or not. In spite of all that is said, you leave it for the joint action of Congress, or, practically speaking, in all probability it will be left to one single individual, regardless of the will of the people of this country, whether the United States remains in this league of nations or goes out.

Let me give an illustration, Mr. President. Some one yesterday spoke of the President of the United States being elected with a mandate from the people. President Wilson was elected. But a year ago the people of this country did not agree with the policies of President Wilson, and they elected in both Houses of Congress a majority of the opposing party. Mr. President, it might well be that at some time in the future the paramount issue before the people of this country would be whether the United States should longer remain in the league of nations or get out. The President may have been elected, and this issue comes up two years later, and if the people, at the off-year congressional elections, upon that issue express their will to get out of this league of nations, but the President is of a contrary opinion, if we do not provide for concurrent action, one man, the President of the United States, may defeat the will of the people. Upon a proposition of this character I believe the will of the people of the United States should control, and whenever the time may come when a majority of the House of Representatives and a majority of the Senate of the United States, by concurrent resolution, declare that they believe the United States ought to get out of the league of nations, it ought not to be within the power of a single man, through the exercise of the veto power, to keep this country in against its will.

Ah, but, it is said, if he does veto it, it can be passed by a two-thirds majority. That is true. And yet we know, Mr. President, in a matter of that kind, in all probability if it is a political issue before the country, how practically impossible that would be. At this very moment we have the spectacle, boasted of openly by some, that there are 40 faithful Democrats here who are willing to surrender their own convictions and their own judgment, who are waiting to find out what the President of the United States wants done about the reservations in this treaty, and are then willing to vote however he asks them to vote. Then talk about passing a withdrawal resolution over the veto of the President! Mr. President, if there should be a Republican President who should want to keep us in the league against the will of the people, I do not want the time to come when the power of the Executive, exercised upon the legislative branch of the Government, with 40 "faithful Republicans" can defeat the will of the people of this country.

Therefore, Mr. President, I think that this amendment ought not to be adopted, but that this right of withdrawal, or the giving of the notice of withdrawal, ought to be by a concurrent resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not know upon what authority the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] makes such a reckless and utterly unfounded statement as that 40 Democrats are waiting upon the will of the President in the casting of their votes. It would be just as much justified if I should say that 49 Republicans on the other side are taking the will of the Republican leader on that side. I have made no statement of that sort and no one here has done so. We allow a reasonable suspicion that Senators on the other side are standing by their own opinions and their own will, and I think the Senator from Wisconsin ought to be fair enough and generous enough to Senators upon this side of the aisle to assume that if Senators upon the other side of the aisle can combine to stand for a certain principle, Senators upon this side of the aisle can do it without doing it at the dictation of any man, either the President or anyone else.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator from Nebraska say that there is not a very large percentage of Senators—I only took the number of 40 roughly—upon the other side of the aisle who are ready to combine with him in doing whatever the President of the United States asks them to do in reference to the treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I deny it.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That issue was not raised, and it will not be raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKellar	Simmons
Ball	Harding	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Harris	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Harrison	Moses	Smith, Md.
Calder	Henderson	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Hitchcock	New	Smoot
Chamberlain	Johnson, Calif.	Newberry	Spencer
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Sutherland
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Swanson
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Thomas
Dial	Kendrick	Penrose	Townsend
Dillingham	Kenyon	Phelan	Trammell
Edge	Keyes	Phipps	Underwood
Fall	King	Pittman	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Kirby	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
France	Knox	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Ransdell	Warren
Gay	Lenroot	Reed	Watson
Gerry	Lodge	Robinson	Williams
Gore	McCormick	Sheppard	Wolcott
Gronna	McCumber	Sherman

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the clause in the reservation which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has moved to strike out provides that the Congress may, by concurrent resolution, give notice of the intended withdrawal. There are some Senators who apprehend that that clause trenches upon the authority of the executive department in general and trenches upon the authority of the present occupant of the executive chair in particular.

I do not imagine that such a purpose was in the minds of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations when they drafted this particular clause. It is not in the minds of certain Senators who are supporting this clause of the reservation. Speaking for myself alone, such a purpose is certainly not in my own mind. I have no disposition to trench upon the authority of the executive department, either in general or in particular. We could not do so if we would, and for my part I would not do so if I could. I would safeguard the powers of the executive department quite as jealously as I would guard the powers of the legislative department.

If this league should prove to be an unmixed blessing, as we all sincerely hope that it may, then the United States will remain in the league, no matter how many ways there are leading out of the league. If, on the other hand, the league should prove to be undesirable, it seems to me that the more fire escapes we have the better it will be for all concerned to meet that situation.

In order to allay any suspicion that there is any purpose entertained here to disparage the Executive authority, I move to insert in the clause, in line 2, on page 2, after the words "may be given by," the words "the President or by," so that it will read:

And notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by the President or by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Is that moved as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GORE. No; it is perfecting the clause before the motion of the Senator from Colorado to strike out is put.

Mr. THOMAS. It is in the form of an amendment, and relates to the same part of the reservation?

Mr. GORE. It does. I am seeking to perfect the clause before the motion to strike out is put, which I understand is the proper procedure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma is in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I move as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to strike out the word "concurrent," before the word "resolution," in line 2 on page 2, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "joint."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota in order now, in view of the fact——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not until the vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. NELSON. I am offering it as a substitute.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Minnesota will remember that the Senator from Oklahoma has tendered an amendment and, as I understand, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has withdrawn his amendment or is holding his motion to amend in abeyance until the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma is disposed of.

Mr. THOMAS. No; I have not withdrawn it, but I want to say I am satisfied——

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that the original proposition is the second reservation. To a part of that the Senator from Colorado has offered an amendment, and I am now offering an amendment to his amendment, which is in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I am satisfied from the discussion on the amendment which I offered yesterday that it will not receive a majority vote of the Senate. Entirely because of that conviction I therefore reluctantly withdraw, if I may be permitted to do so, my proposed amendment and ask to have substituted for it the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]; or if it can be treated as a substitute for my proposed amendment I will consent that that may be done, so far as I have any authority to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn. Does the Senator from Oklahoma offer his amendment now?

Mr. GORE. I desire to submit my amendment. I am not certain whether it has precedence over the amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota or not. It seems to me it probably would have precedence.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What was the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the word "given," it is proposed to insert the words "by the President, or," so as to read:

and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by the President or by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That motion is nothing else than a proposed amendment, I presume?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is all.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course, my consent to withdraw my amendment is conditioned entirely upon the action by the Senate upon the proposed amendment of the Senator from Minnesota; and I shall renew it if that amendment is not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will have the right to renew his motion. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and, therefore, withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. He is absent; I am, therefore, obliged to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is confined to his room this afternoon on account of illness, and therefore can not be here to vote. He is paired on this and other votes to-day. I make this announcement in regard to the Senator from Tennessee to stand for the day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is absent from the Senate on account of illness, being confined to his room. He is paired on all votes to-day with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I desire that this announcement shall stand for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 68, as follows.

So Mr. GORE's amendment to reservation No. 2, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

Mr. GORE. I wish to give notice that I reserve the right to offer the amendment in the Senate. I may not do so, but I give the notice.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I suggested a short time ago, to strike out the word "concurrent," on page 2, in line 2, before the word "resolution," and to insert the word "joint."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, it is proposed to strike out the word "concurrent" and to insert the word "joint," so as to read "may be given by a joint resolution."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, before proceeding to vote on the pending question, I ask indulgence of the Senate for a few moments. As Senators know, I have occupied but little time in discussing the treaty; but as I have sat here listening to the debate and reading much of the debate my mind has been impressed by the utter lack of elasticity in our system of government as compared with the parliamentary system of Great Britain. The spectacle we have witnessed of a branch of the Congress of the United States—the Senate—being in apparent hostility to executive head of this Government would never have been presented under a parliamentary system of government. It shows, I repeat, the utter lack of elasticity in our system, and indicates that we have much to learn in that respect from Governments where a real parliamentary system is established.

There is another thing that has occurred to me: We have heard much in this debate about open diplomacy; but does anybody imagine that the Constitution of the United States could ever have been framed and made as perfect an instrument as it is if the framers of that document had been compelled to sit in open session and had been badgered by the newspapers and other outside influences from day to day? Would any sane man contend that a Constitution such as we have could have been framed under such conditions? It was fortunate, Mr. President, that the convention which shaped that document sat in secret session. In that way only were they able to produce such a wonderful instrument.

Mr. President, the campaign that has been waged against the league of nations reminds me very much of the campaign that was waged against the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. Those who are familiar with the history of those days will remember that as soon as that instrument was made public and offered to the American people there was immediately a campaign of vituperation started against it; all kinds of evils were predicted. A bitter fight was made against it in Massachusetts; a bitter fight was made against it in Pennsylvania; a bitter fight was made against it in Virginia. In those Commonwealths and elsewhere it was predicted that the most dire results would follow if the Constitution were ratified; it was alleged that the States would lose their rights and that the people of the United States would lose their rights; but, Mr. President, by very close margins in some of the States the Constitution was finally ratified and adopted. Lo and behold, it has turned out that instead of bringing in its train the evil results which its enemies predicted, it has, from first to last, proved a blessing to the American people.

And so whatever we may do, the treaty having been ratified by four of the great powers, the league of nations will go into operation, and I predict that the same thing will happen in respect to the operations of that league as happened in the case of the Constitution of the United States.

But, Mr. President, these are mere general observations. I desire just for a moment to bring the Senate down to the particular question involved. Here is the provision:

> Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

Evidently this paragraph needs amendment, and a reservation to correct the evil is fully warranted. The first question is, Who is to determine when the United States has complied with its obligations? The treaty left that a blank. It might be said, indeed it has been argued by a good many, that the United States itself would be the sole judge, but that is a debatable question, and we have attempted to solve it in this reservation.

The next question is, Who is to give notice of withdrawal? That is likewise a blank in the treaty. It is not indicated whether notice shall be given by the President or by an act of Congress.

Mr. President, we have two theories presented here. The theory announced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] is that if we adopt this reservation as it is worded there are two authorities that may withdraw the United States from the league of nations—one is the President of the United States and the other is Congress, through the medium of a concurrent resolution.

It is useless to argue the constitutional question as to the effect of a concurrent resolution, for the reason that the proponents of that method of procedure are perfectly candid and admit—the Senator from Georgia, the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Missouri, and others admit—that the purpose is to have this action taken by a concurrent resolution without any action of the President; in other words, to accomplish it without a legislative act. Then, as I intimated a moment ago, there is a dispute as to whether the President has the power of denouncing the treaty. The authorities cited by the Senator from Wisconsin only go to the extent—and they could not well go any further—that the question of denouncing a treaty is a political question in which the courts will not interfere.

I recall cases where, by legislative action, we have directed the President to denounce treaties. One noted instance was in the case of the so-called sailors' act. There was a great conflict in the provisions of that law with many of the treaties we had with foreign countries, so in that act we required the administration, within a certain time, to denounce conflicting treaties.

The question that occurs to me is this: Do we want in this case to have two distinct tribunals to pass upon the question whether or not we shall continue in the league; or, had we not better repose the power in one tribunal? Would it not be wiser and more legitimate and more consonant with principles of justice and fair play to require the withdrawal to be brought about by an act of Congress, and deprive the President of the power?

If I had my way—and I believe that is the honest and aboveboard way—I would say that withdrawal from the league of nations should be accomplished only by an act of Congress. That would eliminate from consideration both the President and the concurrent-resolution proposition now before us.

Mr. President, I am not a lover of the President, any more than many others. He has made grave mistakes, and he has made far more grave mistakes in his administration than he has with respect to this treaty or the league of nations. The greatest mistake, and one from which we have been suffering ever since, was the mistake he made when he acquiesced in the demands of the railroad men two years ago, when they threatened to hold up the whole transportation system of the country. When he lay down on that occasion, and submitted to that threat, and induced Congress to submit to it, he sowed the wind from which we have been reaping all this whirlwind of strikes that we have had in recent times.

While I hold no brief for the President, we must all concede that over there in Europe he had hard work to perform. The radical mistake he made—and who is there, even among the statesmen on this side of the Chamber, that is free from mistakes?—and a mistake that ran during the whole war period, was that he would not intrust anybody but Democrats with the consideration of public affairs. [Laughter.] If he had taken over to Paris two prominent Republicans of national character and reputation to cooperate with him, and had not isolated himself as he did, much of the trouble that has occurred would have been avoided; and if he had done as they did in other countries—as they did in England, as they did in France, as they did in Canada—if he had had a cabinet composed of members of the two great parties, and had asked the cooperation of the Republicans, which he ought to have done, together with the Democrats, he would have had much smoother sailing.

I make these remarks incidentally, but I want to say that, with all his mistakes, the President from his standpoint has worked hard, and has exerted himself to the utmost. He may be mistaken; I think he is, in many particulars; but the President is now lying on a sick bed, and we are asked here in the Senate to put a slight upon him by putting in this provision in regard to a concurrent resolution, in order to cut him off, as it is viewed here in the Senate. That goes against my grain, Mr. President. I am a Republican, and have been all my days, since I came home from the Civil War—then I was not old enough to vote—and I have always adhered to my party; but I do not approve of the intense partisanship that at this moment would put a slight upon the President of the United States, and would say to him, "We do not trust you to have anything to do with denouncing this treaty. We want to provide for denouncing it by a concurrent resolution, as to which you will have nothing to say."

Mr. President, I submit that such an amendment as I have suggested, providing that this treaty may be denounced only by an act of Congress, thus cutting off both the President himself and also cutting off this concurrent-resolution proposition, would be the best system; but if you do not do that, for God's sake, put in the word "joint" here instead of "concurrent," so that the denouncement or the withdrawal from the league will have to be done by an act of Congress.

Mr. President, let us on this side not be carried away by hostility to the President. Let us keep our heads on, and let us pass just such legislation as we would if we had to-day a Republican President. If our withdrawal from this league should take place by a power independent of the President alone, let it be done by an act of Congress, and not by a mere concurrent resolution; for there is no doubt at all, from what Senators have said, that the object in making this a concurrent resolution is simply to cut off the President from having a hand in the matter.

For these reasons I sincerely trust that the Senate will adopt the amendment, putting in the word "joint" instead of the word "concurrent." There is more that I could say, but I forbear at this time prolonging the debate unless somebody assails me. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. What are the doorkeepers doing about enforcing the rules of the Senate?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very reluctant to consume any time in this discussion; but I have so high a regard for my friend the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that I feel it is due to him that he should know why I can not support the amendment which he has proposed.

I will not enter upon the inquiry that has been pursued here respecting the constitutionality of the reservation as it has been offered by the committee. There is a reason which moves me to exclude the President of the United States from any participation in the determination of this question, entirely apart from the legal aspect of the matter.

The Senator from Minnesota says, and he says very truly, that we have an inelastic Government. I am quite in sympathy with his inferential disparagement of our system. We have an independent Executive, and supposedly an independent legislative branch of the Government.

The whole history of the United States is one continual encroachment of the executive branch of the Government upon the legislative branch. This encroachment is not confined to Presidents of any particular party. It has been in progress from the beginning, and all that can be said of it is that recent years have accelerated progress in that direction.

It might be said, I think it will be admitted, that the composition of our Government makes that encroachment or invasion inevitable. The very moment that the Constitution of the United States gave to the President the appointment of all the officers of the Government save those of a legislative character, that moment it conferred upon him a power and an influence which can not be successfully resisted.

This treaty, if we enter into it, will immensely, tremendously increase the power and the influence of the President of the United States, because it will confer upon him the authority to compose, so far as we are concerned, a government of the world, and involve the selection of a vast number of representatives who, in their turn, will exercise the influence which belongs to their offices.

It would be impossible for me to conceive a President, Democrat or Republican, who would be willing to destroy, for his office, the influence and the power which this treaty will confer upon it. No President will be capable of exercising a fair and impartial judgment with respect to the operation of this treaty, its advantages, or its disadvantages.

Long ago I made one resolution. I declared it before President Wilson came into office, for I held these views, and I expressed them with all the energy of which I was capable in a time in which there was a Republican President, and I have criticized a Republican President for the assumption of powers which belonged to the legislative branch of our Government far more severely than I ever criticized a Democratic President.

I at least have been consistent with respect to the opinions I hold upon this subject. I am not willing to advance in this way the influence of the Executive, and I must advance it if I concur in the creation of this new relation to the world. I am not willing to do it and at the same time give to the Executive the power to veto our withdrawal from the partnership into which we are about to enter; for that is substantially what we give him.

These are my reasons for believing that in some way or other the Executive, not President Wilson, for I am sure that he will long have passed out of office when the occasion comes for this determination, but any Executive, any President, the right to interpose an obstacle which is practically insurmountable, against the withdrawal of the United States from the relation into which we now propose to enter.

For these reasons I can not support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota. If our Government were organized so that there would always be harmony between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government, of course, I would support his amendment with entire confidence in the outcome.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not discussed the question now before the Senate, and I did not intend to do so, but I wish to call attention to one fact. The motive of hostility to the present occupant of the Presidency has nothing whatever to do with the framing of this reservation, and anyone who will stop to think about it for a moment will see that it can not have. In all human probability the present President will not be President after the 4th of March, 1921. This, if it limits the power of the President, is much more likely to apply to Presidents of my own party than to Presidents of the Democratic faith.

This clause was put in, Mr. President, and I support it, because I agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that it involves a great advance of Executive power, which advances too fast and too far in any event. I do not want to see us left where the President, as the Senator from Iowa said, can practically veto our retirement from the league.

That there is nothing personal in it, I think is demonstrated by the fact that nearly every member of the President's own party has just voted against inserting the word "President" in the reservation. Among others who voted against it was the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I do not think that they reflected upon the President by doing it, and there is no such intent at all in this language.

Mr. THOMAS. Do I understand the Senator to say that all the Senators on this side voted against that amendment?

Mr. LODGE. I did not say "all." I said nearly all.

Mr. THOMAS. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. And I think I am correct. Mr. President, I have nothing further to say. I merely wished to make that explanation. I hope we can now get a vote.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I was very much interested in the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], especially in reference to the veto power of the President of the United States. I will assume that they are perfectly disinterested, and that they really believe, what I do not believe for a single moment, that there will be no joint or concurrent resolution introduced here and voted upon before March 4, 1921, to take us out of the league of nations. But whether that be true or not, I know one provision that was made in the Constitution which I believe to have been a wise one, and that was the provision conferring the veto power on the President of the United States upon all legislation unless it was of sufficient importance to command a majority of two-thirds as against that veto power.

If it were in my power to change the Constitution to-day whereby we would destroy the right of the President to veto a bill, I would not do it. I believe it is conducive to safe legislation. I believe it is a preventive of dangerous and radical legislation. I would retain it in the Constitution. If I understand those Senators, they would modify the Constitution so as to deprive the President of any authority over legislation because of the mighty power that is conferred upon him through the appointive system.

There is just as much reason for depriving a President of the United States of his veto power on questions of important legislation as there is for depriving a President of his veto power in the matter of withdrawing from this league of nations, and I can not agree with those who can see a distinction between the two cases.

Therefore, Mr. President, I shall heartily support the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota which preserves the only known method of national action. I would not put it in the power of the President alone to withdraw this country from the league; I would not put it in the power of Congress by a resolution to withdraw this country from the league; but I would put it within the power of the Nation, acting under the usual constitutional method, to withdraw this country from the league of nations, and that would be by a legislative act, the only way in which a Government can properly act in all great matters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair that I made before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with respect to my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who is absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when Mr. SHIELDS's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is confined to his room by illness. He is paired on this vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has not voted. As I have a general pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD.]

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 45, as follows:

So Mr. NELSON's amendment to reservation No. 2, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. That amendment was withdrawn in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

While I have the floor I desire to say that I am entirely in sympathy with and expected to vote for the proposition embodied in reservation 2; and in order that I might cast a vote for the reservation, I desired to secure, if possible, the excision of the last clause of the reservation. Inasmuch as the Senate has voted to retain it, I shall be obliged to vote against reservation numbered 2.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, by the provision of the covenant to which this reservation is directed the Government of the United States is permitted by appropriate notice to withdraw. Inasmuch as I regard it as entirely undignified to ask either the consent or the concurrence of a foreign nation as to how we are to express our desire to withdraw, I renew the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and move to strike out all of subdivision 2, after the word "fulfilled," in line 1, on page 2.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is to strike out all after the word "fulfilled," on page 2, in line 1, down to and including the words "United States," on line 3. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. REED. I desire to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is paired on this vote. If present and not paired he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 49, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana to reservation No. 2 was rejected.

Mr. KING. I move to amend the second reservation now under consideration by striking out, on page 1, in lines 12 and 13, the words "the United States" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "any nation so withdrawing," so that if the proposed amendment be adopted it will read:

2. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the league of nations, as provided in said article, any nation so withdrawing shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I trust this amendment will not be adopted. It is an attempt to regulate in the reservations the affairs of other nations. The reservations are intended to protect and guard the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word by way of reply to the Senator from Massachusetts. The amendment offered does not contemplate that the United States will regulate or attempt to regulate the affairs of other nations; nor does it seek to effect in any manner their relations to the league. It has been asserted by many that, under the terms of the covenant of the league, as well as under general principles of international law, any signatory to the treaty would have the right to withdraw whenever it pleased, and that it was the sole judge as to whether it had discharged its obligations under the provisions of the covenant.

So far as I know, that interpretation is the one desired by all to be placed upon the terms of the treaty relating to withdrawal. If so, and it is thought that the covenant is so uncertain upon this point that a reservation is necessary, what objection can there be to a clear declaration upon that point? As I understand, it is the contention of those who have supported this reservation that the provisions of the covenant leave the matter in doubt as to who shall determine whether a nation has discharged its obligations so as to be permitted to withdraw from the league; hence the reservation. If the United States is to be given the right to be the "sole judge" upon this question, why should we decline to yield a similar right to other nations? However, the amendment does not go that far. It only goes to the extent of saying that the United States construes article 1 of the treaty to confer upon it the right to be the sole judge as to whether its international obligations have been fulfilled, and that if any other nation seeks to withdraw, the United States will, as to its conduct in reference to such act of withdrawal, construe the covenant to confer upon it the same right to judge the question of the fulfillment of international obligations. The proposed amendment does not compel or require any member of the league to adopt this construction or prevent any member from leaving the question to the league or any created tribunal to determine whether the right to withdraw exists.

If we assert for the United States the right to be the sole judge, manifestly it would be unfair and discriminatory if we denied the same right to other nations and we insisted that the league or a tribunal to be created should pass upon the question of the right of a member to withdraw from the league.

The amendment should commend itself to all who seek fair play and equal opportunities for all.

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in supporting the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I wish to say that it interprets the actual meaning of the article relating to withdrawal as every friend of the treaty understands it. Every friend of the treaty understands that every nation is the judge of whether the conditions have arisen under which it has the right to withdraw; and it is a presumption on our part to set up a right different from that enjoyed by other nations.

In reply to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, I desire to call his attention to the fact that in other reservations which the committee has reported they do not confine the interpretation of the covenant to the United States, but they assume that the same interpretation which applies to the United States applies to other nations; and they do assume in other reservations to control the action of other countries.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not now discussing other reservations, though I do not think they do make the assumption asserted by the Senator from Nebraska. However, we shall discuss that later. But this——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. I think I have the floor now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I did not know the Senator had not yielded the floor. I do not mean to interrupt him. I shall take the floor in my own right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts disputes the fact that other reservations have presumed to dictate to other nations what is the meaning of the language as it relates to them. Let me read to the Senator reservation No. 9:

9. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

There is an attempt to say to the other nations that the United States understands that they will not undertake through their members upon the reparation commission to control the commerce of Germany—the imports into and exports from Germany.

Mr. SMOOT. As affecting the commerce between Germany and the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It assumes that their representatives on the reparation commission and the reparation commission as controlled by them will not undertake to affect American commerce. So this reservation evidently assumes to speak for and arrange for what other nations shall do upon the reparation commission.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, have I now the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will have it as soon as the Chair recognizes him,

Mr. LODGE. Does the Chair recognize me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the reservation which the Senator from Nebraska has read is an admirable example of the truth of what I was saying. That reservation relates to our understanding as to a particular subject, and covers only the commerce of the United States. We have not attempted to meddle with other nations. I do not believe in meddling with other nations or entangling ourselves with them. I repeat, I hope this amendment will be voted down.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. LODGE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call in respect to my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as previously with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Making the same announcement that I made before, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the pair of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 52, as follows:

So Mr. KING's amendment to reservation No. 2, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the second reservation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the close of proposed reservation No. 2 add the following:

Provided, That the United States shall have the privilege of nominating at any time any nonmember nation of the world for membership in the league of nations, and the privilege of offering at any time any amendment to the league covenant; and in case unfavorable action shall be taken by the league, resulting in a failure to elect to membership the nation so nominated, or a rejection of the proposed amendment, the United States reserves the right to withdraw immediately without condition or notice.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Maryland that I wish he could offer that amendment at some other point. It does not properly belong on this reservation. It refers to the admission of members, which I think is already covered by the treaty, and to the matter of amendment, which is the last article of the treaty.

Mr. FRANCE. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for the suggestion, though I think a further consideration of the amendment will make it clear to him that it relates to the conditions of withdrawal, and the conditions of withdrawal are covered in this particular reservation.

Mr. LODGE. I perhaps did not understand it completely. I thought it referred to the proposal to admit new members to the league and to the right of amendment. The clause of the treaty in regard to amendment is very loosely drawn, and as the treaty now stands anybody can offer an amendment. The matter of nominating and electing new members, I think, is covered in an earlier article of the treaty, if I am not mistaken. It seemed to me, therefore, that the Senator from Maryland could offer the amendment at a more appropriate place than on this particular reservation. I do not want to interfere with his offering it, of course.

Mr. FRANCE. It had occurred to me that inasmuch as it states the conditions under which there may be an immediate withdrawal from the league, without notice, this was the appropriate place for it.

Mr. LODGE. The last two lines, of course, apply to this reservation. If the Senator desires to offer those two lines, of course they would fit in at this point; but the other parts do not seem to me to belong in this reservation—the parts covering the election of members and the offering of amendments. The last two lines, of course, are applicable to this reservation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if I understand the amendment correctly, if they refuse to admit to the league the nominee of the United States, or fail to accept an amendment which the United States may propose, then the United States may withdraw without notice.

Mr. LODGE. I misunderstood, then. It is my fault. I never happened to examine the amendment before this moment. It does not seem to me to apply here. Of course, if the Senator——

Mr. FRANCE. The reservation which we are about to adopt, as I understand, when read in connection with the articles to which it refers, deals with the question of withdrawal, and provides that under certain conditions we can withdraw after two years' notice. My amendment states the conditions under which we may withdraw without any notice whatsoever, and this seems to me to be the proper place to offer it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not the substantive part of the Senator's amendment the right to nominate members and the right to offer amendments, and then, in case of unfavorable action, we have the right of withdrawal without notice?

Mr. LODGE. That is the way it seemed to me, without having an opportunity to examine it further.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, inasmuch as the amendment seems likely to provoke discussion, and may result in a prolonged debate, I shall withdraw it at this time. I had thought that it might be disposed of in a very few minutes; but since it may lead to prolonged discussion, I shall withdraw it now and offer it at a later time as a reservation.

Mr. LODGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator, for I should like to get a vote on this reservation now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any further amendments to be proposed to this reservation?

Mr. LODGE. On the adoption of the reservation I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the second reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, on which the yeas and nays are requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with respect to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before in regard to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], if present, would have voted "yea." He is paired on this question.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 35, as follows:

So reservation No. 2, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I offer two reservations, and ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reservations are as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace signed at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and the other belligerent powers, with this reservation: That

Whereas the Government of the United States takes the view that it is entirely competent, through the legislative power delegated to Congress by the Constitution and the inherent legislative powers of the several States of the Union, to deal with all questions of domestic policy and economy and especially with all questions concerning the status and relations of labor and the welfare of the people of the United States, without the maintenance of any international organization for such purposes; and

Whereas article 23 of said treaty of peace provides that members of the league of nations agree to endeavor to secure fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations, the effect of which will be to require the United States to participate in and contribute the expenditure of an international labor office;

Therefore the United States of America withholds its assent to section A of article 23 of the said treaty of peace and excepts and reserves the same from this act of ratification, and the United States of America declines to participate in any way in or to contribute or be bound to contribute to the expenditures of any international organization which may be set up in accordance with section A of article 23 of said treaty of peace.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace signed at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and the other belligerent powers, with this reservation: That

Whereas article 23 of the convention of the league of nations, incorporated in the said treaty of peace, provides that the members of the league of nations, in accordance with international convention to be hereafter agreed upon, will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children; will undertake to secure the just treatment of native inhabitants under their control; will intrust the league with general supervision of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children, in opium and dangerous drugs; will intrust to the league general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition; will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit for the commerce of members of the league; and will endeavor to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease; and

Whereas none of the aforesaid objects may be effectuated without the negotiation and ratification of international conventions which shall formulate the particular measures to be employed for such purposes; and

Whereas article 24 of the convention of the league of nations provides that all international bureaus and all commissions for the regulation of matters of international interest hereafter constituted shall be placed under the direction of the league; and

Whereas the Government of the United States considers that it is desirable and necessary that the United States shall have and preserve liberty of negotiation and action with respect to the formulation of international conventions, relating to the aforesaid subjects; and

Whereas the United States agrees that the international bureaus and commissions which may be constituted by such conventions for the regulation of matters of international interest are to be properly placed within the supervision and control of the league of nations, in conformity to article 24, aforesaid:

Therefore the United States withholds its assent to article 23 of the convention of the league of nations incorporated in said treaty of peace, and excepts and reserves the same from this act of ratification.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to offer for printing in the RECORD the following reservation.

The reservation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Reservation intended to be proposed by Mr. FRANCE to the reservations proposed as a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany.

At the close of reservation 14 add the following:

"Except that, in accordance with the principles declared in article 22, that the tutelage of the peoples which are no longer under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are not yet able to stand by themselves should be intrusted to the advanced nations, who can best undertake this responsibility, the principal allied and associated powers shall renounce in favor of the United States all their rights and titles to the colonies and territories in Africa formerly held by Germany and transferred by Germany to said principal allied and associated powers under articles 119 to 127, inclusive, and the United States shall act as mandatory of such territories, to the end that the inhabitants of these colonies and territories may be civilized, educated, and fitted for self-determination, and to the further end that the United States shall closely cooperate with Great Britain, France, and Belgium, and with such other powers as have interests in Africa in a permanent, progressive, and upbuilding policy for the development of all of the peoples and resources of Africa, and further that the ratification of this treaty by the United States shall be only on condition that the principal allied and associated powers take such action as is herein provided by the renunciation of such rights and titles to the United States."

Mr. FRANCE. I also desire to offer a series of reservations which have been prepared by Mr. Henry W. Williams, a member of a distinguished Maryland family, and one of the leaders in the legal profession of Baltimore. Mr. Williams is chairman of the executive committee of the Maryland branch of the League to Enforce Peace, and has urged favorable action on the part of the Senate upon the treaty. However, after making a most careful analysis and study of the covenant, he reached the conclusion that the reservations which I submit herewith are proper for the safeguarding of American rights and for the prevention of any international misunderstandings which might follow differing and conflicting interpretations. I consider these reservations as important, since they are the result of the work of a man of high legal attainment who has been and is a most earnest advocate of the league of nations.

The reservations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. FRANCE to the pending treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

Add at the proper place the following:

"1. The United States understands that any member of the league of nations having given the two years' notice of its intention to withdraw, as provided in article 1 of Part I of said treaty of peace with Germany, is the sole judge as to whether or not all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant of the league of nations shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

"2. The United States understands that the suggestions of the council of the league of nations as to the means of carrying the obligations of article 10 into effect are only advisory, and therefore, inasmuch as the United States is governed by a written Constitution wherein it is expressly provided that the power to declare war is vested exclusively in Congress, a suggestion of the council which would require the United States to make war is a matter which the Congress, under the provision of the Constitution, is and must be entirely free to determine by what, in its judgment, is at the time consistent with the honor and duty of the American people.

"3. The United States understands that under article 15 of the covenant of the league of nations such questions as immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other purely domestic questions are solely within the jurisdiction of the individual member of the league, and are not by this covenant submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations for the decision or recommendation of any other power.

"4. The United States understands that it is not obligated by the covenant of the league of nations to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which depends upon or involves its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, and that the Monroe doctrine is preserved unaffected by any provision in the said treaty contained."

SECRET EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in secret session.

The motion was agreed to, and the doors were closed. After 10 minutes in secret executive session, the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LODGE. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until Monday, November 10, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, November 8, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, author and finisher of our faith, let Thy blessing descend in full measure upon these Legislators, the Representatives of a great people, that the remaining hours of the week passing into history may crown their efforts with success and reflect credit upon themselves, the Nation, and honor and glory upon Thee.

We thank Thee that the Government is busy rounding up the radicals, the disloyal to a Government which has given them succor. May they be summarily dealt with, driven from our Republic, in the name of law and order, peace and prosperity, love and good-will. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROMOTION OF AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 375.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10378, "A bill for the promotion of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes," and, after general debate, which shall continue not over four hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] and one-half by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], said debate to be confined to the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. Thereupon the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on all amendments and on the bill to its passage or rejection without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I understand that an agreement has been reached between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] and the gentleman from Missouri [Judge ALEXANDER] that three hours of debate be had instead of four, as provided in the rule. If that is agreeable, I ask unanimous consent to modify the rule in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to modify the rule by substituting three hours instead of four hours for the time to be consumed in general debate. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am informed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] that the matter has been discussed and that that is satisfactory. So far as I know, there is no objection on this side of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Kansas whether or not debate is limited to the subject matter under consideration?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I assume that with this cutting down of general debate, for legitimate purposes there will be liberal debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, it is under the general rules of the House.

Mr. WALSH. I mean that there will be opportunity for liberal debate on legitimate amendments.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the modification of the rule?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the rule is simply to provide for the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. I see no reason for discussion, and unless there is desire for discussion on the other side——

Mr. GARRETT. I have had no request for time on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON), there were—yeas 34, noes 0.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10378, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries present this bill, H. R. 10378, under very happy circumstances. There is no opposition in the committee of any nature, nor has there been any movement of any kind, except for the betterment of the bill, during its consideration. The meetings of the committee have all been open, and discussion of this bill has been full and ample. There was no reference of the bill to any subcommittee, nor have there been any private conferences to serve any particular interests. It has been considered jointly by both political sides represented on this floor, and the committee come here to-day with a full report and agreement upon the bill.

I wish to speak particularly of the work on the bill for the reason that I have had, as chairman of the committee, assistance from every member of the committee. I wish to make special reference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS]. By unanimous vote of the committee and at its request Representative EDMONDS prepared the report upon the bill, which required considerable time and attention, and I am under great obligations to him, as is the committee, for the excellent work he has done and for the time that he has devoted to every feature of the bill.

With respect to the former chairman of the committee, Judge ALEXANDER, and his associates on the committee, I can only speak in the highest terms. The word "politics" or the thought of politics has not entered into any part of the discussion of the bill. We were united for the purpose of bringing in a bill for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, and we have presented a bill which I think will meet the situation as it confronts the United States at this period of our national life.

If anything should develop hereafter that would require amendments to the law which I hope may grow out of the presentation and passage of this bill by the House of Representatives, if any feature of the merchant marine business should require amendments to the proposed law, I think there will be no serious trouble in coming to an agreement upon whatever amendment may be necessary in the dim and distant future.

I believe the question of the American merchant marine is the most important question that has been brought to the attention of this House. When we consider that there were but seven American vessels in the overseas trade before the late war in 1914, and now I request you to carefully consider the vast number of vessels for the overseas trade which have been constructed since and are now in process of construction, you must realize, as I certainly do, that there has been great advance in the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, representing this important branch of the service of the United States.

There is another feature to which I desire to direct your attention. We had very little to build on—had to lay out a foundation. We have been governed entirely by rules and orders of the special shipping act, and in every other feature we have been ruled in a manner that limited our powers, but as a committee we have harmonized all of these difficulties and have begun the work which I hope will find hearty cooperation at the northerly end of this Capitol and also among those of our fellow citizens, in business and commercial life, who have been anxiously awaiting a movement on the part of this legislative body in the right direction.

The Shipping Board are agreeable to the bill which is presented here, so that there is no disturbance there, and I hope that when this bill reaches the other body we may be able to come to an agreement at an early day, and they may be able to come to an agreement on this bill without any material change. While it is true that bills have been introduced of rather a different nature, still this committee did not feel that these bills meet the situation as this bill does, and I think when you look at the fact that there are 21 members of this committee, and there are likely to be among those 21 members differences of opinion arising that it would be hard work to harmonize. I realize and every member knows that there never has been any differences of a serious nature in the committee during the consideration of this bill. So that I feel very much gratified, after a long service on the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, more than any other Member of the House, for I am the only Member who has remained on the committee from the beginning of my service, and the only Member on the Republican side of the House who returned to the chairmanship of the committee of which I was chairman when I retired from that position when the gentlemen on the other side of the House controlled the election and controlled the committee, and during all the intervening time I have had great respect for the gentlemen on the other side of the House, as I have for the gentlemen on this side, and knowing as you all do the radical feeling of myself in politics, it would be rather rare to find many persons who would so successfully harmonize with all his associates that nothing should arise which would cause any ill feeling in the committee. I am very glad to present this matter in this way, and I ask permission to make such extension of my remarks as I may find necessary in reference to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I now yield 15 minutes to my loyal friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS]. [Applause.]

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take much time to talk about the bill except to explain it. My time is too limited to go into any long discussion in regard to the merits of the bill. The other gentlemen who will follow me will probably take that up. In the first place, the committee spent three or four months off and on in investigating the division of operation of the Shipping Board. We found that originally the operation of the vessels by the Shipping Board was done by a control committee in New York. With the numerous demands of the war very little attention has been paid to the detail of making the operation of those vessels a money-making proposition. After the armistice had been declared, or a short time before the armistice had been declared, Mr. Rosseter was brought from the Pacific coast to take charge of the operation. Mr. Rosseter is an expert steamship man and has been in the business all of his life. He is now, and has been for some time, the vice president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., and connected with the Grace Co. and a number of other shipping institutions. Mr. Rosseter took active charge of the operations, I think, about January, and he has infused into the situation a very accurate and able operating force. Now, the situation with the board to-day is this: During the war we passed a number of appropriation bills containing legislation in connection with shipping. The operation, expenditure, and the ships naturally followed the appropriations which had been made to the President of the United States and delegated by him to the Emergency Fleet Corporation. There was also a revolving fund in the Fleet Corporation of $50,000,000 which they were supposed to draw on from the Treasury any time they needed it and under certain restrictions use it. It made two different lines of work being performed by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, one by authority given to them through the appropriation bills and through the President of the United States, and the other one through the shipping bill. After thoroughly going over the matter, it was the conclusion of the committee that the only thing that could be done would be to repeal all of these acts except the original shipping bill, and then endeavor to concentrate the work of operating these ships and also the expenditures of money in the Shipping Board itself, the proper place for it. Otherwise it would be impossible for the Appropriations Committee when they came to make their appropriations next year to tell exactly how to work the thing out. Now, in doing this we have given the Appropriations Committee an opportunity to place the Shipping Board and its different expenditures upon the same basis exactly as they would any other department of the Government. So you will find in the first section of this bill that all the acts connected with the activity of the Emergency Fleet Corporation are repealed. Section 2 provides for the turning over of everything controlled and owned by the different activities, whether through the President or whether in the Shipping Board, to the Shipping Board. In other words, it confirms their authority in taking care of and closing up all contracts or the continuing of contracts and of operating the property owned.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. Is it the purpose of this bill to give the Shipping Board control of all these boats that have been built by the Government?

Mr. EDMONDS. They have control to-day under authority from the President. It takes that authority away and gives that control back to the Congress.

Mr. HULINGS. The gentleman says that Mr. Rosseter is connected with the Grace Co.?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Rosseter is connected with the Grace Co.

Mr. HULINGS. That is one reason the Grace Co. is enabled to get such large numbers of these boats to run?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, I do not think the Grace Co. has any more boats than——

Mr. HULINGS. It has.

Mr. EDMONDS. Is the gentleman posted on the matter? Does the gentleman know how many vessels the Grace Co. have?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMONDS. How many have they?

Mr. HULINGS. I think 12 or 15.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think I can answer the gentleman's question if he desires me to do so.

Mr. HULINGS. Can the gentleman tell me how many they have?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; I can tell the gentleman how many they had on August 6. On August 6 the Grace Co. had 30 boats.

Mr. HULINGS. Thirty boats; does that include their own?

Mr. EDMONDS. The American-Hawaiian Co. had the same number. No; that did not include their own. That was the ships allocated to them.

Mr. HULINGS. Will Mr. Rosseter, at the head of that board, have control of the allocation of all these ships?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Rosseter has never touched the allocation of ships. It came under his department, but he kept away from it severely.

Mr. HULINGS. I happen to know that that was not so.

Mr. EDMONDS. That may be, but Mr. Rosseter makes that statement.

Mr. HULINGS. How much does this Mr. Rosseter get for salary?

Mr. EDMONDS. I have not any idea.

Mr. HULINGS. Is he a dollar-a-year man?

Mr. EDMONDS. I can not tell you, but I think not.

Mr. HULINGS. Is this Shipping Board to have control of the finishing of all these boats?

Mr. EDMONDS. Let me say something to the gentleman. Mr. Rosseter has resigned. He is not there any more. He left on the 1st of November, after performing a very meritorious service for the Government.

Mr. HULINGS. I do not think he did.

Mr. EDMONDS. I differ with the gentleman, because I have gone into it. I think he performed a very meritorious service to the Government.

Now, section 2 of the bill, gentlemen, turns all of this property except that which is still needed for the military and naval service over to the Shipping Board. Section 3, which is probably the most interesting section of the bill, provides that the Shipping Board shall sell these ships except as provided in section 4, which allows the sale of the undesirable ships to aliens. Now, that probably, as I said, was the most interesting question to the House. The committee went into this question thoroughly. I do not want to answer for the members of the committee that were not present, but we who were present united and made a unanimous report, and there was more than a quorum present when we made this report, and direct the Shipping Board to, as fast as they could consistently with the interest of the Government, sell the ships to private parties. It means that, as near as I can see, and according to my own personal feelings in the matter, we are announcing a policy to the shipowners of the country that it is not the intention of the Government to continue in the shipping business. The situation is very well described in a question asked by Mr. CHINDBLOM, of the House, of Mr. Rosseter in the hearings. Mr. CHINDBLOM asked Mr. Rosseter, on page 71 of the typewritten hearings:

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it not a fact that as long as the Government continues to build and announces no policy with reference to the continuation of that program that private capital shrinks from investing its funds in shipbuilding and simply holds back to find what the ultimate purpose and policy of the Government is going to be? Is not that the actual situation?

That question was answered "yes" by Mr. Rosseter.

Now, shipbuilders are no doubt looking for contracts, and I understand there is a considerable sum of money held in reserve by the large shipping companies to either build or buy ships. As long as the Government continued the policy of trying to get the war price for these ships they would not buy the ships, because they could get the ships allocated from the Shipping Board to themselves to carry on their trade, while they could go out and contract for $150 to $170 a ton in the shipyards and get their ships built probably in six months.

As near as I can find out, we are fast approaching the time when the world will be overbuilt with ships and the Government of the United States, if it does not intend to embark on a Government-ownership program, is certainly going to act like a dog in the manger in holding the ships and preventing our capital from going into the shipping business, allowing other countries to build shipping to take care of their trade and eventually to find ourselves either in such an expensive competitive market on account of the overbuilding of shipping in the world or the ships will be tied up at the wharves and not able to run. I believe, and I think most of the members of the committee believe, probably all of them, that it is just as well for us at the present day to take our war losses on these ships and sell them at the market, and we have expressed ourselves in this bill in that way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The sale is to be confined to American citizens?

Mr. EDMONDS. To American citizens, except those undesirable sizes of ships; and I will say more about that when I come to section 4.

Now, I think that is a very sensible view to take of the situation. On the 1st of July of this year the world was building 8,000,000 tons of ships. There were 49,000,000 tons of ocean-going shipping built. In 1914 we had about 50,000,000 tons of ocean-going shipping and about 4,000,000 tons of it was lying idle. There was only work for 45,000,000 or 46,000,000 tons. Now, with 58,000,000 tons in sight the next few months, and the world's trade disorganized like it is, certainly there is going to be an overbuilding. It is a question whether the Government wants to run these ships as a Government-ownership proposition and have the loss, which will be enormous when the combetition becomes very strong, or get rid of the ships now when the going is good.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the Hog Island yard running at full time?

Mr. EDMONDS. The Hog Island yard has had a number of ships canceled. I have not the data right here. They are building 12 or 14 ships for the Army Transport Service, on account of the contract that was originally made with them. That was a part of the contract, and the balance had to be finished on account of the material on hand.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman state what the price is per ton now on the ships that are being sold?

Mr. EDMONDS. By the Government?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. The Government is trying to get from $200 to $225 per ton for the good steel ships. For the wooden ships they are willing to take almost any price.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was speaking of the steel ships.

Mr. EDMONDS. Two hundred dollars to $225.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman state how that compares with the British price?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; I can do so. The Nauticus for October has an account of two new ships, 8,110 tons dead-weight, which were sold for £240,000 each.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Can I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is about £30 a ton cost. That would be between $120 and $130 a ton.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The price we are receiving is nearly $100 a ton more?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; and if you expect them to stay in business, you will probably find that the price will be a little high.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman advised as to the cost of ships to-day at Hog Island?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; I am not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I say Hog Island because I assume that is the cheapest place.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not think that is true. I think there are a number of other yards that have made commendable records in the building of ships and building them more cheaply than at Hog Island.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was speaking of the Hog Island of to-day.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would not want to answer positively as to that. That would come more under Mr. Walsh's investigating committee. I have an idea that the price has been considerably reduced at Hog Island, but I do not know how much.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was my idea.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the Shipping Board have any ships suitable for service upon the Great Lakes?

Mr. EDMONDS. Well, they had some ships that were taken through the Welland Canal, and I have no doubt they would be suitable for service on the Great Lakes. But as a rule I do not think they would be suitable for the freight trade. I think they could use mostly passenger ships.

Mr. SHREVE. I mean combined passenger and freight ships.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think they probably will have some.

Mr. SHREVE. We have need along the southern shore of Lake Erie for some ships of that kind to take the place of those of the Anchor Line stopping at Cleveland and all along there. That service was interrupted at the time the freight and passenger services were separated. We have not had any ships to take their place. What I am anxious to know is whether from the Shipping Board ships could be gotten to take the place of those of the Anchor Line.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not think there could be. The ship has to be of a size that would go through the canal connecting the lakes. I do not know that they have ships that would suit you. You have to get an ocean ship around Lake Erie, and the canal is not large enough to take a ship over 3,500 tons. In some cases the Government cut the ships in two to take them through.

Mr. SHREVE. Are they not building such ships now?

Mr. EDMONDS. Freight ships, as I understand.

Mr. SHREVE. Are they not suitable for service on the Great Lakes?

Mr. EDMONDS. I doubt it, because the hatches are constructed differently.

Mr. SHREVE. Where are these ships being built on the Great Lakes?

Mr. EDMONDS. At Detroit and Manitowoc, and, I think, some at Erie, Buffalo, Cleveland, and other points.

Mr. SHREVE. They are the small type of ships?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. They are small, but on account of the demand for shipping we built every kind we could in order to supply our need.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, there are many of us who want to hear the gentleman analyze the bill. We are becoming worried lest he may not have time in which to do it.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. I used to be somewhat familiar with the shipping service on the Great Lakes. I was connected with the transportation service. The vessels built for the Great Lakes service are built with a flatter bottom. They have only about 20 feet of water in Lake Erie. The ocean vessel, in order to stand great storms, is built narrow, and in order to get them up there they have to cut the vessels of any size in two in order to get them through the Welland Canal.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I wanted to ask the gentleman if it was the intention or if the effect of this bill was to validate all contracts and agreements and undertakings that the Shipping Board or the Fleet Corporation had heretofore entered into?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; it is not. The intention is to continue the contracts under the Shipping Board that have been promulgated under the order of the President. That is all. If the wording indicates that we are going to validate the contracts made by the Shipping Board we would like to change it.

Mr. WALSH. I will wait for the five-minute rule. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman further.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question for information?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think his citation of two British ships at £30 a ton would be a fair estimate of what British ships are being sold for now?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. The Munson Steamship Line, of New York, had a contract for a steamship in England, requisitioned by the British Government, and the British Government is turning it over to them for $103 a ton—a newly built ship.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one moment?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] asked this question a while ago, if ships built at Hog Island did not cost more than ships built in other yards? Is that the question?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not a fact that we ought to take into consideration that when this shipyard was built we did not know how long the war would last, and if the war had lasted, say, a year longer maybe ships could be built there cheaper than elsewhere, with the preparations that they had.

Mr. EDMONDS. Perhaps so. I know the cost has diminished very rapidly since they got rid of the Sunday work and overtime.

Now, section 4 allows the board to sell to aliens such ships as they find undesirable. I think that is a very good suggestion, because if we did not do that we would have no use for some of these ships in the ocean-going trade. For many of the routes they are too small, but they could be used in the Baltic Sea and in the Black Sea and in the Mediterranean. There is a great demand in France and Norway for such ships, and it is a good thing to get rid of them at a proper price and proper time. I do not think we can go out and compete simply by holding the ships back.

Section 5 requires the ships to be insured in proper proportion, where the Government retains an ownership in the ship or has a mortgage on a ship. Section 6 establishes an insurance fund. They may find it necessary. But I do not believe it will be. But they should have the authority in case it is necessary.

As to the operation of ships in section 7 we will offer a committee amendment to this section which will allow the Shipping Board full latitude in operating the ships that are not sold.

The board is allowed to sell certain property. You realize that the Shipping Board entered into a lot of activities. They own transportation bonds; they run passenger and freight lines; they built shipyards and factories for material needed in the construction of the ships; and these things have to be transferred and taken care of with the rest of the property.

Now, section 9 takes up the appropriation bills. It arranges for the continuing of the appropriation bill until July 1, 1920, and after July 1, 1920, it stops all use of revolving funds excepting such as the Committee on Appropriations give to the board as an operating fund or an insurance fund if they find it necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will grant the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. EDMONDS. Section 10 is simply a continuance of a provision made in the appropriation bill, which we thought would be necessary as long as the transfer was being made.

Section 11 stops all new construction in the way of housing, and provides that they shall as rapidly as possible dispose of these houses to private parties.

Section 12 allows the delegation of powers.

Section 13 contains the title of the bill.

Now, gentlemen, that is the bill as brought out by the committee. It is simply a plain, business proposition. We have taken up all these different activities and united them all under one body, so we can in the future know exactly where to go and know that there the authority rests for appropriation or for information. We have tied down all of these different activities to one place, not leaving any delegated powers in the President. It will all be in the Shipping Board, and that Shipping Board, while appointed by the President, is a body like the Interstate Commerce Commission, under Congress. I think this will give us a start for our legislation that we are going to bring out in the future, and will place it in a businesslike form, so that we can continue the activities in a proper manner instead of the loose manner in which it has been done in the past.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. The bill provides for the sale of these vessels. Does the gentleman think the provisions of this bill are such as to encourage and eventually to force the sale of these ships? My idea is this: Suppose the Shipping Board, or whatever Government officials are conducting this business, should decide that they would like to continue it indefinitely, and that they would not like to sell these vessels, even though they were being run at a loss to the Government.

Mr. EDMONDS. Section 7 limits their activity to five years.

Mr. TILSON. In any event, they must cease at the end of five years?

Mr. EDMONDS. Unless Congress gives them further extension. That is taken care of in the original shipping act, and will be in the amendments to section 7 which will be offered by the committee. We concluded that at the end of five years we would make a survey of the situation to see how they stand in the matter.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I want to inquire whether there has been any estimate as to the amount of money turned into the Treasury.

Mr. EDMONDS. I could not tell the gentleman that, because the Committee on Appropriations has turned all the money into a revolving fund that keeps moving all the time, and it will not be turned into the Treasury until July 1, 1920. Then the Appropriations Committee will take care of it, I have no doubt. We can not tell that now, because if they sell a ship to-day they turn the money into a revolving fund and use it for building a ship to-morrow.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Are we going to build more ships?

Mr. EDMONDS. We are building more ships to-day. You will notice in the back of the report a statement of the ships that are now under contract. They are under contract because the material has been furnished, and it is cheaper to finish the ships than it is to cancel the order, even if you take a loss of $50 or $75 a ton. It will be better to do that than to turn the material loose as junk.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. In section 4 you say:

That the board is hereby authorized and empowered to sell to aliens, at such prices and on such terms and conditions as it may determine, subject to the same limitation as to completion of time of payments as provided in section 3, such vessels as it shall deem unnecessary to the promotion and maintenance of an efficient marine.

In that section you limit the sale to aliens only. Why would it not be better simply to leave that open and let them be sold to anyone who wanted to buy?

Mr. EDMONDS. Section 3 allows them to be sold to anyone, but the shipping bill limits the sale to American citizens. In section 4 we say they can sell to aliens such ships as they find undesirable. For instance, there may be 50 ships of 2,500 tons, 25 of which it would be desirable to sell to Americans, and the other 25 it would not be desirable, and they may be sold to the Norwegians or the French or to anyone. That is fully covered. I do not think there is any trouble on that score. The Shipping Board understand that situation, and the original shipping act covers it, and also this act which is reported to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. EDMONDS. With pleasure.

Mr. BLANTON. This being a shipping bill, intimately connected with ships, and inasmuch as sailors are more or less superstitious, may I ask the gentleman why the committee in framing this bill brought in 13 sections only.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. The majority of the mayor of Philadelphia on his nomination was 1313.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Missouri use some of his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized for 1 hour and 30 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the Chair please notify me at the end of 25 minutes?

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it will not be possible for me to go through this bill and discuss it in detail at this time. When the bill is taken up under the five-minute rule, I think the committee will be able to give the House the desired information on any point not made perfectly clear in the general debate. The title of the bill is as follows:

A bill to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

Section 1 of the bill repeals all the legislation enacted during the war and vesting in the President very large powers with reference to the building of ships, the commandeering of shipyards and plants and the materials entering into the construction of ships, the commandeering and taking over of transportation facilities at shipyards and for housing workers in shipyards, and regulating ocean freight rates. These are some of the great powers vested in the President in the war emergency legislation repealed by section 1 of the bill. All these acts which are repealed by section 1 would expire by limitation as soon as the peace treaty with Germany has been agreed to, except the first act mentioned in section 1, which would expire in six months after peace with Germany has been declared. Hence it is important at this time that we should have some legislation under which some agency of the Government should take over and exercise the powers conferred on the President under those several acts.

The President has delegated to the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation the powers vested in him under those acts; but, as I said, in one instance the power would end six months after the proclamation of peace and in the other instances immediately upon the declaration of peace. Hence it is important that this bill should be passed as speedily as possible.

The bill does not delegate to the Shipping Board any new powers. It does, however, give the board full power to adjust, settle, and liquidate all matters arising out of or incident to the administration of those emergency laws and to wind up the business and dispose of the property and settle the claims which have grown out of the administration of the law by the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation under powers delegated to them by the President of the United States under the acts repealed by section 1 of the bill. The repeal of such acts or parts of acts is subject to the following limitations:

(1) All contracts or agreements entered into before the passage of this act under any such act or part of act shall be assumed and carried out by the United States Shipping Board, hereinafter called "the board."

(2) All rights, interests, or remedies accruing or to accrue as a result of any such contract or agreement or of any action taken in pursuance of any such act or part of act shall be in all respects as valid, and may be exercised and enforced in like manner, subject to the provisions of subdivision (c) of this section, as if this act had not been passed.

(3) The repeal shall not have the effect of extinguishing any penalty incurred under such act or part of act, which shall remain in force for the purpose of sustaining a prosecution for the enforcement of such penalty.

(c) As soon as practicable after the passage of this act the board shall adjust, settle, and liquidate all matters arising out of or incident to the exercise by or through the President of any of the powers or duties conferred or imposed upon the President by any such act or part of act; and for this purpose the board, instead of the President, shall have and exercise any of such powers and duties relating to the determination and payment of just compensation.

Section 2 transfers to the board all merchant vessels and other property or interests of whatever kind, including vessels or property in course of construction or contracted for, acquired by the President through any and all agencies whatsoever in pursuance of authority conferred upon him by the acts and parts of acts repealed by section 1 or in pursuance of the joint resolution approved May 12, 1917, authorizing the President to seize the German vessels.

Section 3 undertakes to declare the policy which should govern in the disposition of the fleet of merchant vessels now constructed or being constructed and belonging to the United States.

Section 3 is for that reason the most important section in the bill. It is as follows:

SEC. 3. That in order that the merchant vessels now owned or controlled by the United States may be returned to or placed under private ownership and operation, and to the end that an efficient merchant marine, adequate to meet the requirements of our ocean-borne commerce and to serve as a naval auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, may be established and operated by citizens of the United States, the board is hereby authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, to citizens of the United States (as defined in sec. 2 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended) except as provided in section 4, all of the vessels referred to in section 2 or otherwise acquired by the board. Such sale shall be made at such prices and on such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe, but the completion of the payment of the purchase price shall not be more than 10 years after the making of the contract of sale. The board is authorized to take into consideration in fixing the sale price of such vessels the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of and demand for vessels, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold.

The first question the committee was called upon to determine was whether the present and future policy of the United States with reference to this vast fleet should be permanent ownership and operation by the Government or whether it should go into private ownership and operation? The committee in section 3 undertakes to indicate to the Shipping Board the policy of Congress with regard to this great fleet of merchant vessels, and if it is agreed to to declare that these vessels shall go into private ownership and operation as soon as practicable. In other words, that we shall develop the American merchant marine under private ownership as a permanent policy of the Government.

We also indicate to the board that they shall not consider the war cost of these vessels as the price at which they shall be sold into private ownership. They were constructed under war conditions and at a very high cost. The vessels must be operated in competition with the merchant marine of the world, whether under Government or private ownership. If we hope to win our share of the world trade it is manifest that the successful operation of an American merchant marine should, as far as possible, be on an even keel. But I will discuss that matter later.

Section 4 authorizes the board to sell to aliens undesirable types of vessels and prescribes the terms of sale.

There are many vessels belonging to the Government of less than 6,000 tons dead-weight that will be undesirable in a well-balanced fleet. This section gives the board the power to sell vessels of certain types—for instance, wooden vessels, composite vessels, concrete vessels, and steel vessels of undesirable types—for use in our overseas trade either to American citizens or aliens. Many of them are very desirable and will be readily purchased by American citizens for certain trades. I do not agree with the opinion expressed by some who appeared before the committee that vessels of less than 6,000 tons will not be valuable for the development of the American merchant marine fleet. This gives the board discretion in the matter, and we have reason to believe they will exercise that discretion soundly and in the public interest.

Section 5 provides that if vessels are sold in part on time the board shall protect the Government from loss or damage by fire and against all marine risks and disasters, and so forth, with insurance companies or underwriters and under forms of policies and to amounts approved by the board.

The policy agreed on and so far followed by the board is, as I understand it, that the vessels shall be sold 25 per cent of the sale price payable in cash and the balance of the purchase money to be extended over a term of not more than 10 years. The committee will suggest an amendment extending the time to not more than 15 years. It is good policy that the Government should be assured against loss by a policy of insurance on the vessel, which in the event of loss will be paid to the Government as its interest may appear.

Section 6 provides against unreasonable rates that insurance companies or underwriters may propose to exact or charge; hence it provides that the board may create a fund in which it may insure any vessels or plants or material acquired by the board.

In other words, if they can not get the marine underwriters to write policies on these vessels at reasonable rates it gives the board the power to create an insurance fund and insure the vessels sold, at least to the extent of the Government's interest. I introduced the act creating the War Risk Insurance Bureau. As originally enacted the power was vested in that bureau as an agency of the Government to insure vessels of the United States, their cargoes and freight money, against war risks. That policy was followed during the period of the war, and the bureau insured all ships entering the danger zones against war risks and at a rate ranging from one-half of 1 per cent up to 5 per cent, the latter rate being the maximum when the hazards were the greatest. The insurance companies would have charged from 5 per cent up if they would have carried the risk at all. At the end of the war the premiums charged and received by the bureau exceeded the losses from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. A very great service was thereby rendered to our shipping.

Section 7 gives the board the power to operate vessels enumerated in section 2 and not sold pursuant to sections 3 and 4 in such manner and through the agencies created by sections 9 and 11 of the shipping act of 1916, the time to be limited as prescribed in section 11.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] suggests, a committee amendment will be offered striking out section 7 and substituting therefor a new section providing that the board may operate, charter, or lease the unsold vessels, the time to be limited to five years unless it is hereafter extended by Congress.

It is well to keep in mind that the board will have a fleet of more than 2,000 vessels to dispose of and that the public interest is paramount, and that while it is desirable to dispose of the vessels as soon as practicable they should be kept in service not only to serve established trade routes but to open up and establish new trade routes for the development and expansion of our foreign commerce.

Section 8 gives the board power to sell any property other than vessels transferred to it under section 2. This is a part of the policy of liquidation provided for in section 1.

Section 9 authorizes the board to withhold funds derived from activities of the board named therein as operating capital, or for the insurance fund, to meet the requirements of sections 6 and 7, and provides that the net proceeds of all activities of the board, except for the purposes named, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The section also directs the board, as rapidly as in its discretion is warranted, to withdraw investment of Government funds made during the emergency under authority conferred under the acts or parts of acts repealed by section 1 and cover net proceeds into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Section 10 reenacts section 3 of the emergency shipping fund provisions of the deficiencies appropriation act of November 4, 1918, repealed by section 1 of this act.

In other words, it provides that the Shipping Board shall not require payment from the War Department for the charter hire of vessels taken over by the War Department for military purposes during the period named, and belonging to the United States. It would be interesting for the Congress to know how many vessels were taken over and the value of the service rendered, and that service should be charged off against the cost of the ships. It would make a very creditable showing for the Shipping Board.

Section 11 authorizes the board to complete houses or buildings heretofore contracted for and under construction under the housing act of March 1, 1918.

If my memory serves me right, there are 17 of these projects. These buildings have all been erected, except in a few instances. Some are nearly completed. The testimony before the committee was to the effect that some of the houses needed papering, and some additional improvements to the premises were necessary; but we undertook to limit the expenditures to the sums necessary to the completion of the buildings and to such necessary repairs, and we were told that this would involve an expenditure of not over fifty or sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. In some of these instances the land upon which the Emergency Fleet Corporation constructed houses was purchased by outside parties. Is there any provision in this bill for the purchase of that land from those people so that these buildings can be sold?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We do not confer additional power on the Shipping Board at all. They can only exercise such powers as are necessary to carry out existing contracts and liquidate these projects. The Government has an option to purchase the land on which the Hog Island Shipyard is located, I believe, at $1,750,000, but before that purchase can be made authority must be granted and the money appropriated by Congress, and we do not undertake to determine that question in this bill. Speaking for myself only, I think that should be done.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I can not just at this moment. Section 12 authorizes the board to exercise the power vested either directly or indirectly in it under the act through the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation or other agencies created by law.

With reference to what our policy shall be in the sale of the ships, it seems to me, is a vital question and has much to do with the upbuilding of our merchant marine. I would be delighted to know that the board could sell them for what they cost, but, to my mind, that is not possible, nor is it desirable if we would promote and maintain a great American merchant marine to compete with the merchant fleets of other nations. We may sell some of the vessels at the war cost, but we must face world conditions in undertaking to solve this grave problem.

The world's merchant gross tonnage now afloat is greater than it ever was, according to Lloyd's figures.

	June, 1914.	June, 1919.
Steam	45,403,877	47,897,407
Sail	3,685,675	3,021,866
Total	49,089,552	50,919,273

Much more merchant gross tonnage is now under construction than ever before. Lloyd's returns of greatest prewar merchant tonnage under construction was June 30, 1913—3,445,000 gross tons. Lloyd's return for June 30, 1919—8,017,707 gross tons. The Shipping Board alone now has more tonnage under construction or contract than all the world had in prewar years, and it is costing much more. Congress has voted or authorized more money for shipbuilding than the book value of all the world's merchant tonnage in 1914 before the war.

It is true that the world's merchant tonnage, while greater than ever, is not so efficient as before the war.

(a) Two-thirds of the tonnage under foreign flags was built before 1914. It is now not only five years older, but in the five years has had the roughest treatment—inadequate repairs, and so forth.

(b) Two-thirds of the American tonnage on June 30 was built since 1914, but much of it was built under war conditions, when the aim was to build the most tonnage in the shortest time; it was hurried work, done by partly trained or raw workmen, and needs more repairs, and so forth. Only a few types were built, and of course we have more of some types than we can use, less of others. Only five or six passenger ships were built here after we went to war. In peace times no one would have built about 1,000,000 gross tons of wooden ocean steamers.

I quote from Report of the Commissioner of Navigation:

The losses of merchant steamers of the principal maritime nations from August, 1914, to the armistice of November, 1918, according to Lloyd's Register, were as follows:

Country.	War losses.	Marine losses.	Total.
	Gross tons.	Gross tons.	Gross tons.
United Kingdom	7,753,311	1,032,779	8,786,090
British Dominion	169,712	99,866	269,578
American	343,090	187,948	531,038
Belgian	85,842	19,239	105,081
Brazilian	20,328	10,951	31,279
Danish	210,880	34,422	245,302
Dutch	201,797	27,244	229,041
French	722,939	84,138	807,077
Greek	349,661	65,014	414,675
Italian	745,766	115,669	861,435
Japanese	119,764	150,269	270,033
Norwegian	976,516	195,244	1,171,760
Spanish	157,527	80,335	237,862
Swedish	180,415	83,586	264,001

The marine casualties of steamers were only a trifle above the average, as for the five years from 1909 to 1913, inclusive, they aggregated 2,160,346 gross tons. When it is recalled that for nearly five years in European waters ships ran at night much of the time without lights, and that for part of this period they ran across the Atlantic and along our own coasts without these precautionary signals, the comparative results are a high tribute to the vigilance and skill of the masters and deck officers of the ships. That the losses from both causes were not greater is also due, first, to naval convoys, and, second, to the courage and endurance of officers and men who brought many stricken ships to port which under ordinary conditions would have been justifiably abandoned at sea, and did, doubtless, appear in German statements of submarine ruthlessness. During the four years and four months of war the total losses were 14,224,252 gross tons of steamers. During the five calendar years covering that period the world's output of ships was 14,127,701 gross tons, of which less than 3 per cent were sailing vessels.

The effect of the war, however, went beyond the mortality among ships, for many vessels which under ordinary conditions would have been broken up and sold as junk were patched up and are included in the world's outstanding tonnage. The world's merchant tonnage afloat to-day, as already shown, is greater than ever before and undoubtedly would more than suffice to conduct the world's diminished foreign commerce consequent upon diminished production and vast national debts, if it were as efficient as the tonnage of 1914. Allowances for the customary growth of merchant shipping in ordinary times are quite out of place under present conditions, for such growth is based on increased ocean trade and increased international exchanges of products by sea. There has been no such increase, and there can not be until production has become at least normal abroad as well as at home. Freights must be higher than usual, because under present conditions the European countries with which we fought side by side have not yet been able, through death and devastation, to supply the usual return cargoes of their own production with which to pay for the products of countries remote from the scene of conflict.

It is also true that the volume of the world's sea-borne commerce is less than in 1914, requiring less shipping space. The biggest article of ocean commerce was coal. In the seven months from January 1 to August 1, 1919, Great Britain exported only 24,000,000 tons of coal against 43,000,000 tons for the corresponding period in 1914, and in other articles of British export there is a big decline.

Industrially devastated northern France has not yet begun to export. Belgium is not recovered from the ravages of the Huns, and Russia is still in industrial and commercial chaos. Shifting from war industry back to peace industry is not anywhere complete. Industrial unrest, strikes, and other well-known causes the world over are keeping output below prewar production.

Freight rates are high, not because there is not enough tonnage, but because Europe's production and export is much below normal (see rates of foreign exchange) and the outward cargo, exempli gratia, from America, has to pay for the expenses of the round voyage; temporarily America has to supply Europe with grain and oil, which Russia—Black Sea ports shorter voyage—formerly supplied; with coal—shorter voyage—which Great Britain formerly supplied; also with many manufactures with which European countries supplied one another. This longer haul from America temporarily makes a heavier demand on our ships than usual. Unless Europe has "gone to smash," all this can not continue. Even this longer haul would present no serious difficulty if the ships already built were running normally. Liverpool was tied up by strikes on ships and docks for weeks early in the summer, New York has been tied up two or three times since June, also other ports here and abroad. Docks and warehouses are congested because the railroads can not move goods.

The British railroad strike contributed in a large degree to this condition, and the strike in the steel industry and in the coal industry, if continued, will paralyze American industry and tie up our transportation facilities by land and sea.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Just for a very brief question.

Mr. HICKS. The gentleman made reference to the fact that owing to the war conditions the forced construction of ships made them more inefficient than formerly. Have any steps been taken to make these ships now of the same standard as those made before the war?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think every ship under construction now is being well built and at less cost than during the war.

Mr. HICKS. I mean the ships that have been constructed. Is it possible to bring them up to standard?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand that some of them will have to be repaired, no doubt. In my opinion, the number has been grossly exaggerated.

Mr. HICKS. Is it a physical possibility?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It can be done. Riveting may have been bad in some cases and in some yards, and there may be other defects in construction that can be repaired, but the materials used were good.

It should not be overlooked that we had to create the facilities to build ships and train the labor employed. It was a herculean task, and all credit is due the United States Shipping Board for overcoming the innumerable obstacles that confronted them on every hand. And what has been accomplished?

But to continue. It may be there is enough tonnage already and soon there will be too much; that with the completion of our building program there will be too many vessels of the types we have built, unless we assume that present turmoil the world round is to continue indefinitely and that Russia will not grow wheat, England will not dig coal, France and Belgium will not manufacture commodities for export.

Just about 100 years ago, after the Napoleonic wars, we went through an experience much like the present. In Adam Seybert's Statistical Annals (Philadelphia, 1818) you will find the following:

The most memorable of revolutions was commenced in France in 1789; the wars consequent to that event created a demand for our exports and invited our shipping for the carrying trade of a very considerable portion of Europe. * * * A new era was established in our commercial history; the individuals who partook of these advantages were numerous; our catalogue of merchants was swelled beyond what it was entitled to be from the state of our population. Many persons who had secured moderate capital from mechanical pursuits soon became the most adventurous. * * * Temporary benefits were mistaken for permanent advantages; so certain were the profits on the foreign voyages that commerce was only pursued as an art; all the knowledge which former experience has considered as essentially necessary was now unattended to; the philosophy of commerce, if I am allowed the expression, was totally neglected; the nature of foreign production was but little investigated by the shippers in the United States; the demand in Europe for foreign merchandise, especially for that of the West Indies and South America, secured to all these cargoes a ready sale with a great profit. The most adventurous became the most wealthy, and that without the knowledge of any of the principles which govern commerce under ordinary circumstances. * * * Our tonnage increased in a ratio with the extended catalogue of the exports; we seemed to have arrived at the maximum of human prosperity. * * *

Mr. Paul Warburg, who was the first governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the other day was quoted in the press as saying that we are living in a fool's paradise. He had spent three months in Europe studying financial and industrial conditions there, and he said that we did not appreciate the problems with which we will be confronted in the postwar period, and especially in the extension of our foreign commerce; and, I take it, he had in mind, among other problems, the upbuilding of our merchant marine. We have individuals and corporations who are anxious to take over ships because ocean freight rates are now so high and profits so alluring. Temporarily they can make great profits, but we will not build up the American merchant marine if we look alone to the present.

President Monroe's annual message of November 14, 1820, should have our thoughtful consideration. He described conditions not unlike those existing to-day. He states, referring to conditions then:

In forming a just estimate of our present situation it is proper to look at the whole in the outline as well as in the detail. A free, virtuous, and enlightened people know well the great principles and causes on which their happiness depends, and even those who suffer most occasionally in their transitory concerns find great relief under their sufferings from the blessings which they otherwise enjoy and in the consoling and animating hope which they administer. From whence do these pressures come? Not from a government which is founded by, administered for, and supported by the people. We trace them to the peculiar character of the epoch in which we live and to the extraordinary occurrences which have signalized it. The convulsions with which several of the powers of Europe have been shaken and the long and destructive wars in which all were engaged with their sudden transition to a state of peace, presenting in the first instance unusual encouragement to our commerce and withdrawing it in the second even within its wonted limit, could not fail to be sensibly felt here. The station, too, which we have had to support through this long conflict, compelled, as we were, finally to become a party to it with a principal power, and to make great exertions, suffer heavy losses, and to contract considerable debts, disturbing the ordinary course of affairs by augmenting to a vast amount the circulating medium, and thereby elevating at one time the price of every article above a just standard and depressing it at another below it, had likewise its due effect.

I think Members will agree that these statements are almost prophetic, and we might well take note of them in determining our policy in this postwar period, not only with reference to the development of our merchant marine and foreign trade but in the readjustment of business in all lines. There never was a time that called for a higher type of statesmanship than now. There never was a time when the great commercial interests in this country should devote more thought to the solution of the difficult problems growing out of the war than now. We have come out of the great World War victorious over our enemies, but we are facing a great world contest for the supremacy in the ocean-carrying trade of the world. Great Britain has had that monopoly in the past, and while she lost a great many ships during the war, she still has a great merchant marine, and will continue to be a prime factor in the water-borne commerce of the world. But it should be our fixed purpose and determination to build up and maintain a merchant marine that will be adequate to carry at least 50 per cent of our commerce in the foreign trade. [Applause.]

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. I have not had an opportunity to read the bill, but from the gentleman's statement I infer that the general policy of the committee, if the bill is enacted as reported or as proposed to be amended, is to pass title to the shipping properties into private ownership and effectuate their private operation within a period of five years, unless subsequent legislation should be enacted. Is that substantially correct?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. Pending that period, I would like to ascertain what is the policy of the bill first with respect to the status of the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation. The gentleman will recall, if I remember correctly, that in the shipping act of 1916 we provided for the creation of a corporation and authorized the expenditure of a $50,000,000 appropriation for the construction of ships. Does this bill authorize the continuing of the expenditures of existing appropriations by the Emergency Fleet Corporation or by the Shipping Board?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The appropriation of $50,000,000 made in the shipping act of 1916 represents the capital of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation. Through the Shipping Board and such agencies, including the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, as the Shipping Board may select, the vessels may be operated, but this bill does not carry any additional appropriation to build ships.

Mr. HADLEY. There will be no material change of plan, then, under the operation of this bill if enacted?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No. I assume that the ships operated by the Government will be operated through the Emergency Fleet Corporation unless chartered or leased to private companies.

Mr. HADLEY. They would be constructed through the Fleet Corporation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. This bill does not give the Shipping Board power to build any more ships. Of course, they will have the power under existing law to complete the ships now being constructed. If any other ships are to be constructed than those already contracted for, they must come to Congress and get their appropriation for that through the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HADLEY. It does not give them power to purchase more ships?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No.

Mr. HADLEY. Will the operation of Government ships proceed under the authority of the Shipping Board direct, or does it delegate that to the Fleet Corporation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Shipping Board; but section 12 of the bill provides for the exercise of that power through the Emergency Fleet Corporation. That is the agency through which the power is exercised now and where it will continue to be exercised.

Mr. HADLEY. Is it the opinion of the committee that five years will be a reasonable time within which to expect to complete the demobilization of this industry into private hands?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I very much question if it will; but we thought this: If it developed that five years is not enough time in which to complete the process of demobilization, Congress will extend the time.

Mr. HADLEY. The spirit of the bill, I take it, is to enjoin upon the Shipping Board, so far as we can express it in an advisory way under the bill, the policy of proceeding toward private ownership of the property and its operation as rapidly as consistent with circumstances and a due regard for the interests of the Government?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. We recognized this is a great and valuable property, and we do not want it to be wasted or squandered by any agency of the Government by haste in disposing of it.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have occupied all the time I feel warranted in taking at this time.

Mr. Chairman, we should not overlook the fact that the act creating the United States Shipping Board was approved September 7, 1916; that the five commissioners composing the board were appointed in February, 1917, and that the organization of the board was not completed until after the declaration of war.

From the first the board was charged with tremendous responsibilities.

The vast powers vested in the President by the war emergency legislation was delegated to the board and the Fleet Corporation to execute.

How well these agencies have met and discharged this sacred trust is visualized and given eloquent expression in the following exhibit submitted by Judge Payne, chairman of the board, at the hearings on this bill:

SHIPPING FACTS.

SALIENT FEATURES IN ACTIVITIES OF THE UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD FROM SEPTEMBER, 1918, TO SEPTEMBER, 1919.

[Second edition.]

On August 29, 1919, the total seagoing ship tonnage under control of the United States Shipping Board was as follows:

Built by the United States Shipping Board.

	Number of vessels.	Tonnage.
		Gross.	Dead-weight.
Steel	777	3,511,918	5,267,987
Wood	315	728,079	1,109,218
Composite	15	35,003	52,339
Seized from—
Germany	94	567,490	691,905
Austria	1	5,312	6,500
Purchased from—
Japan	15	85,880	128,820
Austria	5	30,521	39,506
Requisitioned from private owners	58	346,583	510,870

The foregoing tabulation does not include 122 steel ships of 465,745 (dead-weight) tons and 63 wood ships of 246,982 (dead-weight) tons sold recently to private owners by the United States Shipping Board nor seized foreign vessels that had been sunk.

America's rapid advance from an inconsequential place among the maritime nations to the post of leadership in shipbuilding was not only phenomenal but is a fair augury for the permanence of its new merchant marine built under the stress of war. At the outbreak of the world struggle merchant-marine construction had almost become a lost art in this country. (To-day this Nation has more ship workers, more shipyards, more shipways, more vessels under construction, and is turning them out more rapidly and in greater numbers than now issue from all the other shipyards of all the world.)

As the premier shipbuilding nation of the world America attained her place in one giant stride. Up to the outbreak of the war we had only 15 vessels of 1,000 tons and over engaged in over-sea trade. To-day the American flag floats from 1,280 ocean-going steamships, 1,107 of which had been built by the United States Shipping Board within the last two years.

In June, 1914, the total gross tonnage under the American flag, including coastwise shipping and the fleet operating on the Great Lakes, was 4,287,000 tons.

In June, 1919, its gross tonnage was 11,983,000, an increase of 278 per cent, chiefly in ocean-going steamships.

The steam tonnage under the American flag is now 24.8 per cent of the steam tonnage of the world. The figures are shown in the following tables.

The world steam tonnage of 100 gross tons and over on June 30, 1919, as reported by Lloyds, was:

Number of vessels	24,386
Tonnage:
Gross	47,897,000
Dead-weight	71,845,500

American steam tonnage of 100 gross tons and over on June 30, 1919, including tonnage on Great Lakes, was:

Number of vessels	3,687
Tonnage:
Gross	11,983,000
Dead-weight	17,974,500

Per cent of world steam tonnage of 100 gross tons and over under United States flag June 30, 1919:

Per cent of number	15.1
Per cent of tonnage	24.8

The above percentage figures include tonnage on the Great Lakes.

In the four years preceding the war the shipyards of this country turned out a total of 107 seagoing vessels (of 1,500 tons and over, chiefly coastwise). This construction represented 805,037 dead-weight tons.

During 1918, a period when the Shipping Board was getting into its stride, there were launched from the yards under its control a total of 4,216,656 dead-weight tons, five times more than had been built in the four prewar years. During the year 1918 shipyards under control of the Shipping Board delivered 3,107,095 dead-weight tons of completed ships.

From January 1 to August 29, 1919, 3,983,135 dead-weight tons of shipping have been launched and 3,845,140 dead-weight tons delivered, a total for the 20 months (since the beginning of 1918) of 8,199,791 tons launched and 6,952,233 delivered.

The original construction program contemplated the building in this country of 17,807,071 dead-weight tons of shipping—2,105 steel steamships of 14,351,971 dead-weight tons, 1,017 wood steamships of 2,978,100 dead-weight tons, 50 composite ships of 175,000 dead-weight tons, and 43 concrete ships of 302,000 dead-weight tons, a total of 3,215 ships.

Of this program there have been—

Delivered (inclusive of 1917, 1918, 1919).

LAUNCHINGS.

In shipbuilding annals the month of July, 1918, was made notable by the record established that month in the launching of 124 steamships representing 635,800 tons (dead-weight). That record was exceeded in May of this year, when 141 steamships, aggregating 723,958 tons (dead-weight), were launched.

Organization of Shipping Board: John Barton Payne, chairman; Raymond B. Stevens, vice chairman; John A. Donald, commissioner; Henry M. Robinson, commissioner; Thomas A. Scott, commissioner.

Mr. Chairman, I would like leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE].

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, the United States finds itself in a fortunate position upon the close of this war so far as tonnage is concerned. When the war broke out in Europe the entire overseas tonnage was less than 2,000,000 dead-weight tons under the United States flag. It is now something over 8,000,000 dead-weight tons under the United States flag. Most of these ships are still in the possession and under the direction of the Shipping Board. The United States secured these ships in many different ways. First, because of the necessity for tonnage they requisitioned ships wherever they could find them belonging to Americans, either coastwise or overseas. Then we bought some foreign ships. Then we seized and operated ships belonging to others that were in our ports. Then under a special act we seized German ships which were in our ports, taking possession of them and operating them. In these different ways we secured ships which helped us to carry on the war with Germany and Austria. Now, the ships we built were not built because we were thinking of the needs of the country in the future. We built everywhere and in any shipyard that would build a ship. We would give them a contract and we would do all we could to hasten the work, so the consequence is that we have wooden ships, we have concrete ships, but a great majority of the ships are steel. The wooden ships will have to be sold for what we can get for them. Some are good. A very few will make valuable ships for commerce. The concrete ships we ought to sell at any price we can get for them. All the steel ships are valuable property. Not all can be used under the United States flag, for we built very extensively on the Great Lakes, and those ships, while good, seaworthy merchant vessels, are nearly all small vessels, running from 3,000 to 4,000 tons. A part of these ships can be used in our commerce and under the United States flag. The balance of them should be disposed of as soon as possible to any one in the world who will buy and pay for them. Now, as to this bill, it is a very simple bill. Mr. ALEXANDER, former chairman of our committee, has explained it with a great deal of detail, and I shall not go further into details. Suffice to say that we first repeal the acts which were passed during the war to enable us to establish a merchant marine. Second, we transfer all the ships, all the shipyards, all the parts of ships lying around, and all the houses—for we have a vast number of houses in many different ports—and the docks and all other property to the Shipping Board. Then we direct the sale of ships, the sale of houses, the sale of building plants, docks, and parts of ships. We direct the Shipping Board to dispose of them as soon as possible. We fix the terms next. That is, we say that all ships that are valuable under the United States flag shall be sold only to American citizens and shall be operated under the flag of the United States, unless the owners obtain the consent of the Shipping Board to transfer those ships.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. ROWE. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It says:

That the board is hereby authorized and empowered to sell to aliens.

Mr. ROWE. I will get to that in just one minute. Going on with terms, the bill says that ships which are not suitable and which are not required for use in the American merchant marine may be sold to anyone who wishes to purchase.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. Have we not sold a good many of these ships to foreign shipowners?

Mr. ROWE. We have sold some; not many. I will come to that in just a moment and state just how many we have sold.

Now, we go further than that. As I say, we fix it that the ships that are desirable, that can be used in the United States merchant marine, shall be sold only to Americans, and the ships which can not be used in our service can be sold to other purchasers regardless of the flag under which they are to operate.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. I will.

Mr. SNELL. In which section does it provide that they shall only be sold to Americans?

Mr. ROWE. In section 3—that I am talking about now. I will come to that in just a moment. Now, it goes on——

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is the policy that is now being pursued by the Shipping Board?

Mr. ROWE. That is the policy, quite largely. Now, we go further than that as to terms. We say that the Shipping Board can use their discretion in selling these ships as to whether they get all cash, or part cash and part mortgage. We authorize them to sell these ships and take 25 per cent or more in cash, and the balance in secured payments. We authorize the Shipping Board in this bill to allow 10 years for the payment of the balance. But I think an amendment will be offered here by the committee to make that term 15 years in semiannual installments. I want to say this about the Shipping Board, that of the ships recently sold, practically all purchasers pay 25 per cent cash down, 12½ per cent at the end of six months, and 12½ per cent at the end of one year. That is a good policy, because the ship will earn more this year than it probably ever can hereafter, and we ought to get large payments while they are having large earnings. You will see that 50 per cent will be paid at the end of one year.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman has referred to terms on which ships are now being sold as distinguished from the proposal in the bill. What are the terms further than as stated by the gentleman—the terms of present sales? You require so much cash?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. Do you make it on a contract of sale?

Mr. ROWE. No; they pass the title and take a mortgage for the balance.

Mr. HADLEY. Do they have sufficient insurance?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Now, the real meat of this bill is in section 3, which states that in order that an efficient merchant marine may be established the ships should be sold and transferred as soon as possible to private ownership. I hope you will all listen to that. The first part of section 3 says it should be the policy in order that we may establish now and for all time a merchant marine that this committee unanimously agrees the ships should be sold as soon as possible to American citizens for operation. It goes on further, and in the last part of that paragraph you will see that we have made a statement, because the Shipping Board feel that they are entitled to a statement of Congress as to what they mean by sale, what the terms are to be, and also what they think of the sale price. Listen, please, to the language in the bill.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. May aliens purchase property under section 8 other than that property named in section 4?

Mr. ROWE. May they purchase property?

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. ROWE. Yes. They may purchase any kind of property; but as to the ships, in section 4 it provides that they can sell ships to aliens not desired in the American merchant marine.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. They can purchase other property?

Mr. ROWE. They can purchase parts. There are no restrictions as to that.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Thank you.

Mr. ROWE. Let me read the last paragraph of section 3, on page 5, as follows:

The board is authorized to take into consideration in fixing the sale price of such vessels the prevailing domestic and foreign market price and demand for vessels, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, they could do that without any language in there, could they not?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why do you not direct them to do it?

Mr. ROWE. We do. If you read the first part of that paragraph, it says they are authorized and directed to sell these vessels.

Mr. WALSH. You say they are simply authorized to take this into consideration. Does not the gentleman think it better to incorporate it into the law that it should be taken into consideration, that they must take it into consideration, and not simply give them authority to do it, which in certain cases they might not care to authorize?

Mr. ROWE. No. My own feeling is that the Shipping Board are honest in their desire to sell ships, but they do want an expression from Congress as to the price. I feel confident they will sell them if we say——

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. During the process of selling these ships as soon as practicable, while that process is going on is the Emergency Fleet Corporation to operate the ships?

Mr. ROWE. Such as they have on hand; yes, sir.

Mr. HULINGS. Well, they have them all on hand now, have they not?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. Are they to employ the crews and operate the ships as a Government-ownership concern?

Mr. ROWE. They operate all the ships they can.

Mr. HULINGS. They allocate the ships. They hired these ships out where they give $5 a month and from one-fourth to 2½ per cent of the freight charges. Are they supposed to carry on these ships in that same way?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentelman from New York has expired.

Mr. ROWE. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. HULINGS. I would like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. ROWE. We have not directed them as to just what they shall do. We have said they shall operate the ships not sold.

Mr. HULINGS. And hire their own crews?

Mr. ROWE. No; they will not hire their own crews. They will either allocate or charter the ships.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is that intended to cover ships now in process of construction? Do you do anything with respect to them to authorize the sale of those ships before they are completed?

Mr. ROWE. In some cases they have, but not very many.

Mr. WALSH. This bill does not cover that?

Mr. ROWE. It is intended to cover all the ships now in course of construction. Now, I would like to hasten along. I think I have explained the real meat of this bill.

Now, as to the policy as to what has happened, we have been selling ships, but we have sold very few ships, comparatively. We have sold some ships, but we have sold so few that I ought to call your attention to that. We have sold, for instance—we have turned back—48 ships. These are among the best ships that we were building; among the very best that we built during this war. Those 48 ships were requisitioned on the ways. Contracts for these ships had already been let when the war broke out in Europe, and the 48 ships were in course of construction and at various stages, some with the keel just laid, some two-thirds completed, and some three-fourths completed. Forty-eight of these ships have been returned to the people that were building them when we entered the war. Seventy-six ships, or, rather, as the Shipping Board calls it in their statement, 176 ships have been sold. I prefer to call it 76, because I want to be quite accurate. Of those 176 ships 100 were sold to an individual who had not the money to pay for them. He is trying to resell. We do not call that a "sale" in the part of the country that I come from. We call it "an option."

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. As I remember, in reference to the 48 ships turned back, that was under an agreement by which the Government was relieved of all the expenditures it had made?

Mr. ROWE. Yes; and the Government got back the money it laid out, I think, with interest.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I understood there were a number of shipowners who had ships on our ways at the time we entered the war. We commandeered those ships and used them under the flag. I know of a number of cases where those owners are now endeavoring to get those ships back or get an adjustment of their claims as to those ships. What is the progress of those transactions?

Mr. ROWE. The Shipping Board is doing all it can to adjust those cases.

Mr. HICKS. There are a number of them.

Mr. ROWE. Considerably more than half have already been turned back.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The International Merchant Marine Co. had contracted for a tank, which was in process of construction, and the Government took over that ship in process of construction and completed it; and just a few days ago the company took over the ship from the Shipping Board and paid for it, including the increased cost of construction incident to the war, and relieved the Government from any liability whatever on account of the construction of that ship.

Mr. HICKS. The point I had in mind was where a French concern had a contract with an American shipyard for the building of a ship. We commandeered that ship during the war, completed it, and placed it in commission. Now, the French concern wants to get that ship back and obtain an adjustment of the money lost by reason of our taking it, and also adjusting the matter due to our having completed it.

Mr. ROWE. I think the board is adjusting all those claims, and it has adjusted considerably more than half of them at the present time.

Now, I would like to finish my talk if I have time. We have now in the possession of the Shipping Board, completed and in operation, 1,216 vessels. We have taken, because of the war, from those that we were opposed to, 63 vessels. We have 27 others which the Shipping Board purchased. We have now in the storage yards floating 103, or really 143, making 1,448 vessels either finished or nearing completion. We have launched 299, and we have keels laid for 439, and they are in course of construction, and the Shipping Board have contracted for, but not yet started, 174; so that we will have about July 1 next 2,361 vessels, all under the control of the Shipping Board, so that you will see that the sales that we have made, with the return of the requisitioned vessels, 48, the actual bona fide sales, 76, making 124 in all, amounting in the total to 183,000 dead-weight tons, are almost negligible when you think of the 2,361 vessels of 13,445,000 tons which we still have.

It was because of these facts that your Merchant Marine Committee came in with a bill not only authorizing but directing the Shipping Board to dispose of these ships.

There is another very great thing. You all know that this is the golden opportunity for the United States to get into the merchant marine of the world. The world trade, in which Germany and Austria played a very large part, has been destroyed so far as Germany and Austria are concerned. It is now being taken up by the other nations of the world. Is America to have its part of the merchant marine of all the world? We want her to. Every man before me to-day wants us to have a real part in the sea commerce of all the nations. I for one would like to turn these ships back sooner even than we are planning to do, but we must give the Shipping Board an opportunity. We had before us all classes of men, with various ideas. Some would not sell a ship, but want the Nation to operate the last one. Some thought we ought to dispose of every ship within a year. We can not take either extreme. We must give to somebody a chance to sell and dispose of these ships, and nobody is better qualified than the Shipping Board to do this, and to work them into the commerce of the Nation under the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. In the last part of section 4 it says they are to sell or lease such ships as they shall deem unnecessary for the promotion and maintenance of an efficient merchant marine. What class of ships do they consider unnecessary for ourselves?

Mr. ROWE. First, the wooden ships, most of them; second, the concrete ships; and third, small ships of from 1,000 to 5,000 tons, mostly 3,000 and 4,000 tons.

Mr. SNELL. Are those the ones they intend to sell?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] if he will use some of his time?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, our Committee on the Merchant Marine, to which was referred House bill 10378, to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, have given careful consideration to the bill and unanimously recommend the passage of it. This is the outcome of a number of exhaustive investigations by the committee, covering the past four months. The report accompanying the bill explains every section of the bill, and the chairman of the committee, Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, ex-chairman, Mr. ALEXANDER, and others have already explained every detail to the Members of the House. I merely want to say a few words on the importance of having an American merchant marine.

Mr. Chairman, when the World War was declared we had 1,076,152 gross tons of shipping out of about 50,000,000 tons of the world's tonnage. In other words, we carried about 10 per cent of our foreign commerce. Suddenly, like a clap of thunder from a clear sky, there was brought home to this great Nation the imperative need for a merchant marine of its own. Our products could not be sent abroad because we had no ships. Rates became excessive, and many of our industries were paralyzed, and we were face to face with ruin. Take, for example, our cotton industry. As you know, we were depending on the foreign nations to buy about two-thirds of our cotton crop, but because we had no ships to carry this cotton to their markets and because their ships were engaged in warfare on the other side, our surplus cotton could not leave the seaboard. The result was that the price of cotton dropped suddenly from 14 cents a pound to 6 cents a pound—much less than the cost to produce it. The result was that it nearly ruined the South and, of course, every section of the United States felt the effects of it. You of the North and East and West felt the effects of it, because we of the South had no money to purchase your products. Yet we could not complain, because it was our mistake to depend on foreign ships to carry our products to foreign markets. In peace time they did it well and cheerfully, because it paid them to do so, but in war time they were compelled to look after their own business in order to save themselves. Mr. Chairman, it is just as foolish for a nation to depend on foreign ships to carry on its foreign business as it would be for a department store to depend on its competitors to deliver its goods to its customers.

When we entered the war in 1917 our foreign tonnage had increased to 2,191,715 tons under the spur of war needs. As it was, our power was very much impaired by the scarcity of ships. Men and everything they needed had to be carried over water 3,000 miles from home. Ships had to be built quickly, at a high cost, because there was danger of our allies losing out before we could get there and of the United States having to fight Germany alone at our own seaboard and on our own soil. No living being knew how long the war would last. A shipbuilding program was begun and carried on until victory was won. By the coming year we will have a merchant fleet of about 18,000,000 gross tons, including, of course, our coastwise shipping—about equal to that of the British Empire. Mr. Chairman, we now have these ships and the yards to build more ships, and it is up to us to decide upon a sound policy and to enact necessary laws, not only to save what we already have but to maintain it in the future. Not only that we must have our own merchant marine if we expect our commerce to have a fair chance in the markets of the world in peace time, but it is necessary that we do so in case of emergency. The war demonstrated absolutely that an adequate Navy must have something more than battleships, cruisers, and destroyers. There must be colliers, tankers, and supply ships, a merchant marine as well.

It was fortunate for us in the last war that one of our allies owned so large a supply of merchant ships. It was really the merchant ships that kept the enemy submarines from starving not only the allied armies over there but their civilian populations as well. In other words, the war has proved that a great and rich nation must have not only an efficient navy but its own merchant marine.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the American people, regardless of parties, want an American merchant marine. Pause and think. We are the greatest exporting nation in the world, and the second, if not the first, importing nation. We have struggled hard to get this foreign business, and it is our duty as progressive Americans to develop and take care of it if we want our people at home to have employment in our different industries and to prosper and be happy.

The ancients believed that the seas were created to separate nations. Men of genius and ability who invented steamships, flying machines, and cables have demonstrated to us that seas were made to unite nations and to facilitate trade. Other powerful nations have built and are building their merchant marines, and we must do likewise if we are to get our share of the world's commerce. The day has come when we should be no more dependent upon foreign ships to carry our products to market than should any other nation. We all agree that we are to have intensive competition following the World War and that we need a sound policy and sane laws to keep up our position. I am happy to say that this is the third important bill that our Committee on Merchant Marine has recommended to you this session with a unanimous report, all three having in view the building of an American merchant marine, and other bills will be presented to you later having the same object in view.

Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine ever since I have been a Member of Congress, and it has always been my hope that the time would come when we would get together, Democrats and Republicans, and say to the world: "We are Americans first, and we shall build an American merchant marine in American shipyards, by American labor, manned by American seamen, under the American flag, to carry the products of American factories, mines, forests, and farms to the markets of the world." [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, as has been stated, this bill has been reported to the House by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries unanimously and favorably, and I hope I am justified in making the statement that when the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries took into consideration the preparation and study of this bill each member of the committee, both on the Democratic and on the Republican side, displayed absolutely no partisanship or sectionalism, but for once they came together it seems with but one single and common purpose, which was to report to this House for enactment legislation which would at least aid in building up a great and efficient and powerful American merchant marine. [Applause.] As I see it the brightest opportunity in the history of this great country is before us to promote an efficient and a great American merchant marine, and thereby to extend and promote our foreign commerce and trade.

In order to accomplish this much-desired result it is necessary to utilize the ships which, as a result of the war and under the program inaugurated by the Government, have been built and are to be built. Surely every American wishes to see these ships ply the high seas under the American flag and enter every port of the world to transport our commerce and products to the markets of the world.

There is one section of this bill about which I am especially enthusiastic and which I unqualifiedly approve, and that is section 3. It not only authorizes and directs the Shipping Board to dispose of the ships now on hand and which may hereafter be built or acquired by the Government, but it directs the terms upon which they shall be sold, leaving a large discretion in the Shipping Board. These ships can not all be sold in a month or a year or perhaps a term of years, and I believe I am safe in asserting that it is the policy of this committee that these ships shall be disposed of by the Shipping Board at fair prices and as the market will absorb them, and such as can not be thus sold should be operated by the Government.

But there is another feature of section 3 which I most heartily and cheerfully approve. It contains a provision which fixes the policy of this Government in reference to the ownership and operation of the merchant marine. It speaks squarely against Government ownership and operation and transfers it to private ownership and operation. I may be a member of the old school, but, gentlemen, I believe that the primary and paramount object of government is to govern and protect the citizen, and that the Government should never enter business in competition with its citizens. [Applause.] Therefore I stand against the Government ownership and operation of the merchant marine as well as against Government ownership and operation of the railroads of this country. [Applause.]

We feel that we have presented a good bill, and we trust that it will meet with no serious opposition. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back six minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Missouri use some more of his time?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] one-half minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to ask unanimous consent, out of conformity with the rule adopted to-day, that I may insert remarks in the RECORD with regard to the progress of proposed immigration and naturalization legislation, and the nature of the same. The necessity for making this request is the demand from writers of letters all over the country for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I should like to inquire how much time there is remaining.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have 27 minutes remaining.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How much more time have we on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 44½ minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] 30 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the general purpose and the things to be accomplished under the various provisions of the pending bill have in a large measure been fully and amply explained by the gentlemen who have preceded me in the discussion. It shall be my purpose in using the time that has been kindly placed at my disposal to undertake to bring to the consideration of the committee the tremendous problem that your Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries in its deliberations had to undertake to solve.

It will be borne in mind that when we entered this war, although we had built up a splendid coastwise trade and had in operation under the control of American ownership a splendid fleet of merchant vessels engaged in that enterprise, in reference to our foreign commerce and overseas trade less than 10 per cent of our foreign trade was borne in vessels under the American flag and owned by American citizens.

At that time, according to the figures which were presented by Judge Payne before our committee, in June, 1914, the total gross tonnage under the American flag, including the coastwise shipping and the fleet operating on the Great Lakes, was 4,000,000 tons. In June, 1919, under the operation and construction and requisition carried on by the authority of the Shipping Board, that tonnage was 11,983,000 tons, an increase of 278 per cent, chiefly in ocean-going vessels.

Now, gentlemen, when the Shipping Board was authorized and empowered with these emergency powers, delegated to it by the President under various emergency acts that we are now seeking to repeal, the great cry and demand, on account of the destruction of merchant ships by German submarines, was for ships, and more ships, regardless in a large measure of their efficiency or their type. What we were seeking at that time was a vessel of any description that would float and that would carry commerce and supplies and soldiers to the other side. The result of the necessities of that situation and the extreme emergency under which we were acting is that the Shipping Board necessarily has accumulated in this vast tonnage a very large number of vessels—wooden ships, concrete ships, and vessels of small tonnage—that it will be impossible under competitive conditions to operate successfully now that the armistice has been declared and somewhat more normal conditions restored.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would gladly yield, but I would like to go on with my remarks, and then I will yield later. I have been stating the problem with which this Congress was confronted. The Government of the United States now owns or controls more than 8,000,000 tons of shipping. At the completion of its program in 1921, about February or March, it is estimated that it will have for disposition approximately 14,000,000 tons of shipping, the property of the people of the United States, representing an investment of $3,000,000,000.

Bear in mind the number of foreign ships under the American flag in 1914 and those at the present time. The problem that the committee had to confront, to undertake to solve, was to work out a concrete, common-sense, economical, national policy with reference to the permanent disposition of these vessels, so that we can not only go out of Government ownership, but also maintain an adequate American merchant marine.

The committee has unanimously reported the bill which declared against permanent Government ownership and control. [Applause.] Under the testimony that was taken before the committee it was apparent that the Shipping Board hesitated, on their own initiative or their own judgment, to undertake to settle this great national policy and the permanent disposition of the merchant marine, but they intimated that they were waiting to receive the declaration of a positive policy from the Congress of the United States before undertaking any general disposition of their merchant vessels, although they had made some sales.

As has been suggested by the gentleman from New York and others who have preceded me in the discussion, the real crux of this bill is the declaration of our national policy as declared in section 3 of the bill.

In the first section we repeal all of the emergency laws conferring extraordinary power on the President. In section 2 we are converting the title and possession of this stupendous merchant fleet of ours into the hands of the Shipping Board and constituting them our ship brokers, as it were, our agents, and intrusting them with the power and authority to make the very best bargain they can in the disposition of our merchant fleet to citizens of the United States.

Then comes section 3. Up to that point the bill gathers up our property, puts it on the counter for sale, delegates the Shipping Board as the agent and instrumentality through which the sales shall be negotiated and consummated.

Section 3 undertakes to declare what the policy of the United States shall be with reference to the permanent disposition. We had a great deal of testimony on that question, because it was a vexing and perplexing problem for the Shipping Board to determine at what price these vessels should be sold. Any man who will stop and reflect for a moment will understand, not only with reference to the production of ships, but everything else that had to be assembled under wartime conditions, that inevitably the cost of production was stimulated to a much higher degree than under normal times. Not only in this country but in foreign countries the cost was enlarged to a very high degree.

The result was that we had to pay for the construction price of our ships, those that were built or requisitioned, a price above that which we can reasonably expect under postwar conditions, those with which we are now confronted, to receive. So the problem was to give some expression to the Shipping Board of what the Congress of the United States thought should be the determining factors in fixing the price of these vessels, and that we have undertaken to do in section 3 of the bill. It not only authorizes and gives specific directions, mandatory direction, if you please, to the Shipping Board, as soon as practicable, not necessarily to disregard the cost price, which they will not do, to sell as soon as practicable to the citizens of the United States these vessels, but it goes further and says that in fixing that price they are authorized to take certain things into consideration. The gentleman from Massachusetts raised the question in debate that we should go further and give specific direction that they must take into consideration the three elements mentioned in the last sentence of section 3, but we contend, and I believe it is the proper construction, that when we use the word "may" or when you use the word "authorized" in expressing a policy to the executive branch of the Government, that that is tantamount to a direction. We provide that in fixing this price they shall take into consideration the demand in our domestic and in the foreign ship markets of the world for ships; that they are authorized in fixing that price to take into consideration the cost of reproducing vessels of similar type under the now prevailing conditions; and that they are authorized, in connection with these two items, to take into consideration the cost of production and of purchase of these ships which we are to sell. In other words, we said to the Shipping Board, "Now, gentlemen, you have these vessels to sell. We have declared the policy of going out of Government ownership as soon as practicable, and we are leaving it to you to negotiate the situation." One of the experts who testified said we needed on the Shipping Board a man who could drive good bargains, and that is true. I wish we had in the composite membership of that board a combination of Cappy Ricks—you have read the stories of him in the Saturday Evening Post—and David Harum, for that is what we need to carry out the ideal policy of the Government in this situation. The result of section 3 is that we place the property in the hands of the Shipping Board, and we are defining a policy for which the ship buyers and the people of the country have been waiting, and the problem is up to the Shipping Board to carry out that policy.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman has stated clearly the policy of the committee and its recommendation, and I take it that it will be consistent with that policy that the board should be authorized to charter ships as well as to sell them, rather than to operate them, if, in its judgment, it should so decide.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman would read section 7 of the bill——

Mr. HADLEY. I was going to say that section 7 of the bill, with reference to policy, may be broad enough to cover that, but I do not think so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The committee proposes an amendment to cover that situation. We were a little fearful that section 7 was not broad enough to give the Shipping Board authority to charter, and we will amend that section when we reach it.

Mr. HADLEY. That is the reason I made the suggestion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The committee will offer an amendment which will correct any apprehension the gentleman has.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. My impression is that a few years ago we passed a law by which we permitted in our coastwise trade ships that were built in countries other than the United States. As I understand it, recently we annulled that section of the law, so that now only ships can engage in the coastwise trade that are built in the United States?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Or that are owned by citizens of the United States.

Mr. HICKS. They are not necessarily to be built in the United States?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think not.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, we passed a bill here by which we restored former restrictions and conditions with reference to the coastwise trade that prevailed before the war, but that bill has not yet passed the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The war measures authorized ships under the flag of foreign countries to engage in our coastwise trade under regulations made by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. CANNON. And if the Senate passes that bill, no ship can engage in our coastwise trade unless it is constructed in the United States?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That was the bill which we passed the other day.

Mr. CANNON. But it is not now a law, because the Senate has not yet passed it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any provision in here requiring these ships sold to citizens of the United States to be maintained and operated under American registry. Will the owners be at liberty to take them and put them under the flag of England or France?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They are prohibited from doing that.

Mr. STEVENSON. Where is that provision?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is not specifically mentioned in the pending bill, but it is covered by existing law.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is covered by the law which you are amending?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; it is covered by the original shipping act.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand the shipping act of 1916 relating to that question, and it provides that no such vessel without the approval of the board shall be transferred to a foreign registry or flag or sold, nor, except under conditions prescribed by the board, be chartered or leased. That will be found on page 9 of the shipping act of 1916.

Mr. TILSON. In respect to selling or chartering these ships, is not the present a good time to sell rather than to charter, in view of the fact that other countries will undoubtedly begin to pick up in the matter of shipbuilding?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Without reservation, I agree to that proposition. I think it is very imperative, as has been suggested by one speaker, that now is the golden opportunity for citizens of the United States to buy these vessels, and develop the foreign trade, and put the vessels into successful operation. It ought to be the policy of the Shipping Board to sell these vessels to citizens rather than to charter them.

Mr. TILSON. If they are chartered, they may be chartered while business is good and then after a while, when business ceases to be profitable, they may be thrown back upon the United States at an inopportune time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman undoubtedly is correct in assuming that position. Now, gentlemen of the committee, there are some elements in connection with the permanent success of our merchant marine to which we have got to call the attention of the country. The people of Great Britain, especially the people of England, for generations, on account of their insular situation, have thought in terms of ships and they have invested their savings in shipping enterprises. The people at large all over the Dominions of Great Britain have been encouraged by the Government itself and have been encouraged by the banking institutions of Great Britain, and they have been encouraged by propaganda of a proper sort, to invest their money in shipping enterprises, and the result of it is that the people of that great empire, practically every household in that country, have made investment in shipping enterprises. Now, take the United States of America. How many people in continental United States have investments in any shipping? The activities have been confined very largely to a few people and small groups of people in the seaport towns, and the result of it is that the manufacturers, the producers, the laborers, the great bulk and mass of our people in the country at large, have never had their interest stimulated in the importance of a merchant marine.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is not that pretty largely attributable to the fact that under the navigation laws and labor regulations and other regulations that the maintenance and operation of shipping under the American flag and register has been unprofitable; and what is to prevent that condition recurring if we continue the same laws that we had prior to the war?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the gentleman that I refer him to what Mr. Hurley says in his report to the President, that one of the great factors that have heretofore reduced the profits of the American merchant marine is the insurance problem, and I trust every gentleman here, if he can find opportunity, will secure a copy of the official report of Mr. Hurley to the President on this great proposition and read his denunciation of the system that has been in vogue in reference to the marine insurance system and the building of American vessels. Now, if the gentleman in his observation has reference to harmful effects produced by the operation of the seamen's act I do not agree with the gentleman. Some of these people who appeared before the committee, and others who did not, assumed that the result of the operation of the La Follette, so called, seamen's act has been to make practically impossible the successful operation of a merchant marine. If the gentleman will investigate the facts and figures he will see that the overhead, as far as labor is concerned, constitutes less than 10 per cent of the operating or capital expenses of a ship under present conditions.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It will also appear from the slightest observation that the decay of the American merchant marine occurred prior to the enactment of the La Follette Act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Exactly. But to get back to what I was undertaking to suggest to the committee, if we are going to take over by investment upon the part of citizens of the United States the great merchant fleet, consisting ultimately of 14,000,000 tons, we have got to undertake somehow or someway, by propaganda of education or publicity, to arouse and stimulate upon the part of Americans their investment of money or savings in this great enterprise, because it is going to take a large volume of money to finance this proposition, and unless we can find a reasonably adequate price for investors to pay for our ships, the result will be that we will have to sacrifice them in a large degree or else continue Government ownership of this great property. The ultimate result of this effort to run a successful merchant marine in its last analysis is going to depend upon the efficiency and the science and skill of the owners of these vessels, who are to operate them in competition with the other shipowners of the world. It developed in the hearings before our committee that under the present existing conditions, in spite of the great demand for ships and great urgency of getting our commerce to foreign markets, that as a matter of fact, on account of labor conditions, on account of inadequate port facilities, on account of bad wharfage and conditions at foreign ports, that to-day the average time at sea of our cargo-carrying ships is only 35 per cent, and that 65 per cent of the time of every cargo-carrying vessel under present conditions is spent in the turn around, loading or unloading, or waiting on account of inadequate port facilities.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will.

Mr. BRIGGS. Under present conditions of operation, is the operation of ships by the Government a paying proposition, taking into consideration the facts which the gentleman has narrated?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is a question upon which the committee has been endeavoring to get some concrete information. I regret to say up until this time, according to the reports which have been made to us and according to the evidence that has been presented, the committee is not in a position to state categorically whether or not the Shipping Board has been operating its entire fleet at a profit or at a loss. There are a great many ships, as I said a few moments ago, that are obsolete; there are a great many, on account of their small type or on account of their slow speed, it is not possible to operate profitably by the Shipping Board, and those are the vessels that the Shipping Board is authorized to sell to aliens or to foreign Governments; and one of the great problems we have got to meet and master in establishing a permanent successful merchant marine is this question of port facilities, and gentlemen who represent districts where they have seaports, where they are seeking to build up and maintain a successful foreign trade, can not more profitably employ their time than in undertaking to stimulate each local municipal authority with the tremendous—aye, with the paramount—importance of increasing to the very utmost the port facilities that they are interested in, because it means success or failure in the long run for the successful operation of our merchant fleet.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does not the gentleman know that many of the ports have been creating greater facilities than they have ships, and that some of the difficulties encountered have been in the method pursued of allocation of vessels, particularly in the early part of the operation of these ships by the board?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand and appreciate that the board has had a great many difficulties in solving the problem of the allocation of its vessels, and I know a good deal of complaint has been made. I know that in some of the Gulf ports, for instance, complaints have been made by the mercantile interests that the board was not furnishing vessels sufficient to carry the commerce they had to export. The board had a great many perplexing problems confronting it, because a great many people were trying to secure charters or allocation of vessels who were not, as a matter of fact, responsible in a sound business way. What the gentleman refers to is only a temporary situation. What I am undertaking to impress on the committee—and I want it, if possible, to some day reach the people of the country, because it is of tremendous importance in the long run—is the discussion of the factors that are bound to enter into the final and successful operation.

Mr. BRIGGS. This contemplated sale of the ships by the Shipping Board as soon as practicable does not, as I understand it, contemplate the discontinuance of the operation of any of the lines of ships with vessels that are left on hand.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On the contrary, it is the policy of the board, where private interests have not sought so far to get ships, to follow up permanent trade routes and establish them for themselves, to establish permanent lines of vessels for these various trades, and it is the purpose of the Shipping Board not only to not discontinue the regular routes they are establishing, but they propose in selling these vessels to have it, as a part of the conditions, agreed that the purchasers of those vessels shall continue the operations of these well-established routes.

Mr. BRIGGS. This provision that the bill carries does repeal all the power granted the President for fixing rates and charters, but does not deprive the Shipping Board of the power to continue to fix such rates and charters?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not at all.

Mr. BRIGGS. They are still vested with that power under the act of 1916?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely. And the act that we are seeking now to pass does not make any change or seek to confer any new jurisdiction or power with reference to the fixing of rates.

Mr. BLANTON. Just for information, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Section 5 provides for the carrying of insurance by any parties to whom these vessels are sold. Now, may I ask the gentleman from Alabama why the provision is left optional with the board? I refer you to top of page 6, which says the insurance shall, if the board so requires, be made payable to it in the event of loss, and so on. Now, wherever property is insured for the benefit of the beneficiaries, the party who really has the mortgage on the ships, the insurance is always made payable in favor of the mortgagee. In effect, we have a lien on these vessels. Why should it not be mandatory upon the board to require this insurance to be made payable to the United States Government, as its interest may appear, as all insurance policies are so worded?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Undoubtedly, the board will do that. It has been doing it.

Mr. BLANTON. Why should it be left optional?

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. EDMONDS. I should like to say that some of the larger lines carry their insurance on what they call a blanket policy, and in that way they would be able to give some security to the Government other than through actual insurance policies.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not provided for in this section. Section 6 provides that if the board sees fit it may inaugurate an insurance system of its own, but it nowhere provides that in such case it shall require the owner to pay the insurance premium on the insurance carried. Should not that be done?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to secure unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROWE. I would like to ask the same privilege, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to take just a moment of your time to present my views upon this bill that is presented for your consideration. As has been well stated by those who have preceded me, the facts are now in your hands as to the vast amount of tonnage that is in the hands of the United States and will be in the hands of the United States when the shipbuilding program is completed.

In the consideration of the scheme and of the plan to dispose of this tonnage and to determine the policy that should govern the creation of a merchant marine, our committee has, as you know, conducted an exhaustive investigation. It seems to me that it is a remarkable situation that our committee has brought in a unanimous report upon the disposition of the tonnage now on hand, and has also reported unanimously upon the policy which will best build up an American merchant marine.

I am heartily in favor of returning to private ownership at the earliest possible moment the tonnage that is in the hands of the United States at the present time. However, in returning to private ownership and placing in the hands of private individuals and corporations this tonnage, the interests of the people of the United States must be conserved.

An agency must be created for the disposition of the property now owned by the United States, and the Shipping Board, in the judgment of the committee, is the best agency. Notwithstanding the fact that, by the bill we are considering, this board is authorized to sell the property, given some discretion, because section 3, which is the meat of this bill, conserves to this board and gives them this power, yet, while they are directed to sell, they are directed to sell as soon as practicable.

In that connection I wish to call attention to this fact, not in the way of discouragement or disparagement, but simply because the fact exists and has been called to your attention before by preceding speakers, that this tonnage is of all kinds and of all classes. Some of it is good and some of it is fairly desirable, and some of the tonnage is bad and must be disposed of at a loss.

Now, the danger in disposing of this tonnage to private interests is that the cream, the best tonnage, the highly desirable tonnage, will be taken up by those who desire it, and that then the United States will have left upon its hands tonnage that is undesirable and which must be sold then at a great sacrifice. So that when the provision is inserted in the bill that the board shall sell as soon as practicable, this agency of the Government has some discretion, and in determining how this tonnage shall be sold it can protect the interests of the people of the United States.

Of course, it is true that a great part of this tonnage was constructed and that contracts were let for the balance of the great fleet now being completed during the war and that its cost is above normal, but this tonnage should not be sacrificed, but disposed of to the best advantage. While it will be impossible to realize in full the cost of constructing these ships, if the Shipping Board considers the factors authorized by section 3 of this bill, the board should be able to sell the fleet to advantage and at prices that will place the ships in the hands of American shipowners and at the same time realize the greatest return of money to the Treasury of the United States.

To place these ships in the hands of American shipowners will require an immense amount of capital, and I hope the Shipping Board will be able to work out a system of financing the purchase of the fleet so that ship securities will be stabilized and be in such form that the small investor and the country banks, as well as the great financial interests, can absorb them. While the problem is large, the opportunity is there for the development of an American merchant marine second to none in the amount of tonnage and ability to compete with the merchant marine of other countries.

Mr. Chairman, I ask at this time that I may have the privilege of extending and revising my remarks upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman yields back the balance of his time. How much is it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I think this is the one bill in the study of which at the various hearings, extending over a long period of time—in fact, since the opening of this extra session of the Sixty-sixth Congress—there has been at no time any injection of politics. It is true that there have been a great many speeches made on the floor of the House by Democratic Members, boasting that they were in entire charge of the situation during the Great War that we have just finished. It was merely an incident that your side happened to be in charge of the administration at that time. I do not think it is a very good policy for any Member of Congress to stand up and say that his side was the absolute savior of the Nation in any crisis that happened to occur during that administration. I think in all the hearings of this committee we have been aided—I know I myself have been guided, instructed, and greatly interested—by the experience not only of my Republican colleagues under the able chairmanship of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], but by such members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries as Judge ALEXANDER of Missouri, and Mr. BANKHEAD of Alabama, and Judge SAUNDERS of Virginia, and several others of opposite political faith, and I think there has never been a word of politics or political bias injected into our discussions. I might also mention the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], although he has been against us a few times; but I suppose that is due to the proclivity that the Texas Members have of carrying a chip on the shoulder and a gun in the right hip pocket for such a number of years as to have developed the habit of eternal objection. [Laughter.]

This shipping business opens up an entirely new field, especially for our young Americans. In the limited time I have at my disposal I can not, of course, go into minute details as to the merits of the bill, but I do want to touch on a few salient features. You know that for a considerable number of years past sailing the high seas has not been a favorite occupation for young Americans. There was a time 50 or 60 or 75 years ago when American ships, manned particularly by young men from New England, were a great factor as ocean carriers, but that condition sort of dwindled away, and since that time there has been no special opportunity afforded to young Americans to interest themselves in the marine service, except, of course, in the Navy. I speak now more particularly in regard to the merchant marine, the ocean carrying traffic. There have been two colleges in this country training young men for this special service, and also as officers, and a vast opportunity has been given their graduates by the United States Shipping Board taking charge of this situation. A great many young Americans have been employed, and they have measured up to their new responsibilities and have shown masterful efficiency.

One of the interesting features of the hearings was the reading of the records of the young men who had been picked out as supercargoes on these vessels sailing under the American flag to foreign ports. It was interesting and illuminating to read the accounts they gave, after a sojourn of a few days or a week or 10 days in various foreign ports, concerning the lack of facilities, the lack of harbor facilities, the situation as regards coaling, the opportunities of trade abounding in all that territory, for the bringing back of a return cargo to the United States. You must realize, gentlemen, that a great many of the ships operated by the Shipping Board have gone out and returned empty because the disturbance of industrial conditions abroad was such that there was no opportunity for them to bring a return cargo home. The discussion, pro and con, has been going on regarding Government ownership with respect to the railroads. The Government has had charge of them, and in the last year they have run more than a billion dollars behind in operating expenses. But the best evidence given to us by Mr. Rossiter, who has charge of the Division of Operations in the Shipping Board, and by other officers of the Shipping Board who have been before us, is that the United States Shipping Board under Government ownership has been making money. They have no exact means of telling just how much money they have made, because their accounting system, as Mr. Payne has said, had been in a rather chaotic condition, though it was being revised and improved, but some of the interoceanic trips are so long that it takes considerable time for the records to get back so that the statement of profits and losses may be ascertained.

Formerly many considerations were urged against the successful operation of American merchant marine. One was that it would never be successful because the American wage earner on board the ship had to have so much more money. Because of excess number of crew under American law and standard of living, quarters and food on our ships must be so much better than on the ships of other nations. Also because an American sailor could leave his ship anywhere he pleased at any time, and that served to multiply the difficulties of operation. Another consideration was the alleged oppressive American steamboat regulations regarding examinations and measurement rules. This was illustrated by some legislation we had before us recently in regard to the measurement of vessels passing through the Panama Canal. The legislation we enacted in that regard is expected to result in great increase of revenues to the United States, through increased tonnage capacity.

Then insurance enters into the question as a factor. I do not feel qualified to discuss that feature, but that will be discussed thoroughly by the Subcommittee on Marine Insurance. However, many of these considerations that have been urged heretofore as objections interfering with the success of the American merchant marine will be done away with. High wages are the rule elsewhere throughout the country, and instead of going down, wages are going still higher, and they are probably going higher to stay, but that will not be much of a factor in the future, as the matter of wages constitutes only about 12 per cent of the total operating expense. The coal expense constitutes about 30 to 40 per cent of the operating expenses, and this will be reduced after the introduction of oil as fuel. A great many of our ships are not yet finished, and it is a question of what sort of engines will be used in them. The Diesel engine is looked upon as the best and most efficient engine as a means of propulsion.

The oil-burning proposition has an important bearing on the question, because it gives a greater radius of steaming at a less cost per mile with an oil-burning ship, and at the same time you save a great deal of space for revenue-producing cargo carrying, which on a coal-burning ship would have to be used for coal bunkers. The harbor facilities, the port facilities, the coaling stations, the cost of loading and unloading, all enter into this great question of a successful merchant marine. For instance, the point was brought out that the price per hatch hour—that is, the unloading and loading out of the hatch—in New York, where the stevedores' association, through the labor unions, demanded the use of an apparently exorbitant number of men, made the cost per hatch hour nearly $50 sometimes, whereas in other places the cost per hatch hour was only $25, loading and unloading with winches through the hatches. All those things enter into the proposition, and I think they will finally adjust themselves.

The United States Shipping Board report that they are making money under Government ownership, and while I am not in favor of Government ownership by any means, I believe, as has been suggested, that these ships should be retained and operated by the Shipping Board until a proper sale of them can be made, to the advantage of the United States and also to the advantage of the individual citizens who buy them.

The smaller ships are to be sold, because, as is reckoned to-day, the only chance that there is to make much money in oceanic traffic is with ships varying from 7,500 tons to 12,500 tons. Smaller ships than that are of not much avail as money makers in oceanic traffic. They can be used in the coastwise traffic to great advantage.

There was a great deal of evidence brought out at these various hearings; and, as I say, while I do not agree entirely with the Shipping Board, I do not intend at this time and I do not think anybody should criticize them, particularly from a poltical point of view. They were one of the emergent corporations during the war, and I believe that they performed a wonderful duty and did a splendid work, and we should remember that this plan, now that the war necessity is no longer a factor, opens up a new avenue for young Americans.

I should like to go further into the general details of the continuing of shipbuilding. That is a serious project. The ships that we now have will not last forever. The average length of life of a ship is 20 years. A ship must be written off 5 per cent every year for 20 years. Mr. Rossiter informed us that they wrote off their ships in 12 years; that at the end of 12 years they had to entirely renovate a ship from stem to stern. The development of a merchant marine means constant activity in our great shipyards, which build faster and better than those of any other nation in the world.

I just want to say in closing that I am in favor of the United States Shipping Board having the authority delegated to them that is delegated in this bill. I believe that is the only proper thing to do. I believe it is a capable board. I believe they have accomplished wonders in managing a fleet of nearly 1,200 vessels. But when it comes to operating the ships that we have built and are building there is but one problem to be solved. The question is not how the Government may best operate the marchant marine, but how the merchant marine is to be placed under private ownership and operation. The only other question is how soon it can be done. The sooner Congress rids itself of any preoccupation in favor of Government operation and takes up seriously the formulation of a shipping policy based upon private ownership and operation the more assured will be the success of the movement for the restoration of the American flag to the ocean highways of the world, an achievement upon which the American people have set their minds and their hearts with a unanimity that augurs a success that can be prevented only by governmental stupidity.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this matter has been so thoroughly and ably argued by my colleagues on the committee and by other Members of the House that I do not deem it necessary for me to undertake to add anything material to what has already been so very well said.

I want to say, as a preface to my remarks, that before coming to this House I had gotten a wrong impression with reference to the conduct of the Merchant Marine Committee. My predecessor, Gen. Grosvenor, who distinguished himself in this House for more than 20 years, made a great many addresses to the House on the subject of the merchant marine. He was a man who was very emphatic in his statements and very pronounced in his convictions, and I had gotten the idea from reading his speeches that there was a great deal of discussion and political strife in the Merchant Marine Committee. But, as a member of that committee, I have been most agreeably surprised. There has not been the slightest indication of political strife manifested by any member of the committee at any time. Everything has been harmonious, and I want to congratulate the members of the committee on the unanimous action on their part to prepare and present to this House a bill in the interest of the country generally.

The country is expecting this Congress to do something in the way of establishing a merchant marine. Prior to our entrance into the war we had a very small merchant marine. We had allowed our fleet to dwindle to almost nothing. In other words, we American people were too busy to take a practical interest in the transportation of commercial goods between the great nations of the world, but dealt more particularly with domestic affairs.

Through the kindness of the chairman of the Shipping Board I have been furnished with some figures, as I suppose every other member of the committee has likewise been furnished with figures, with reference to what has been accomplished in the past two years. While I have heard some criticisms of the Shipping Board, I must say that in my judgment, from an investigation of what they have been doing in the last two years they are to be congratulated on the splendid success made of this business. It was not a normal time. The United States was involved in a great war, and we could not sit down and take the time to consider coolly just what we were going to do or how we were going to do it. We had to act, and act quickly, and this Shipping Board has demonstrated great ability and judgment in carrying out the shipbuilding program.

This bill, H. R. 10378, entitled "An act to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and to provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes," is the outcome of a number of exhaustive investigations made by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, covering the past four months.

The committee found that in order to establish regularity in the future conduct of the numerous different shipping activities, operated either by order of the President through emergency legislation or by the original shipping act, it would be necessary to concentrate all these operations under one authority, repealing such legislation rendered unnecessary by the ending of the war and providing new legislation for the operation and handling of the property acquired. With this in view, the bill before you and now being considered by the House has for its purpose, first, the repealing of the various bills containing legislation in connection with the upbuilding of the merchant marine, together with the bills containing the unusual powers granted to the President and which were essential for successful operation during the war, and it transfers all the powers necessary for its liquidation, construction, or operation to the Shipping Board, fixing the scope of the Shipping Board's powers so that they can absorb all these activities.

Section 3 of the bill directs that the Shipping Board shall sell judiciously to citizens of the United States their available merchant tonnage, taking into consideration in the sale price the prevailing market price for vessels of a like character, and directs them to disregard the war cost of vessels in making these sales. If it is found that the market price is lower than the cost of the vessels, this will undoubtedly cause considerable loss to the Government, but when it is taken into consideration that with the present building program of the leading maritime nations of the world there must come a time before long when all the tonnage necessary for the carrying of the world's trade must be supplied, and when this time arrives shipping property will naturally be depreciated to the present cost of building, which is considerably less than the war cost paid by the Government. Lloyd's register of July 1 of this year shows that 8,000,000 tons of ocean-going vessels were being constructed upon the ways of the different nations and that there already was constructed an ocean-going tonnage of over 49,000,000 tons, making a total of ocean-going tonnage ready for operation within the next few months of about 58,000,000 tons as compared with less than 50,000,000 tons in 1914. Naturally, with trade conditions in such a disturbed state as they are at present, shipping tonnage will in a very few months equal the demand for it.

The committee also authorizes the Shipping Board to continue its present plan of selling merchant ships under long-term payments. Long-term payments enable men to purchase ships and to go into the shipping business who would not be able to do so if they were required to pay cash for the ships. In other words, it gives the man of ordinary means an opportunity to build up a business for himself in the shipping trade and encourages competition.

Section 5 of this bill prescribes the means for the proper protection of the interest of the Government in ships sold on the deferred-payment plan.

Section 6 provides that the board may have the privilege of maintaining their own insurance fund should it find this desirable. Under this section the board is not required to do so, but if it is found advantageous to utilize this insurance in building up the American merchant marine insurance companies, inasmuch as marine insurance is one of the vital factors necessary for the successful operation of ships, and this has long been neglected by our American companies, it may do so. Statistics show that two-thirds of the marine insurance is to-day written in foreign countries, and the Shipping Board may find some way to utilize this to build up our companies to such an extent that the enormous expenditures in premiums in this line can be retained in the United States.

Section 7 of the bill provides for the operation of such vessels as are not sold by the Shipping Board, in such a manner as it may find necessary, its action in this direction being similar to the powers granted in the original shipping act in 1916. These powers are ample for all purposes, except that they are to end five years after peace has been declared. This will give the Shipping Board plenty of opportunity to establish lines and handle any tonnage they may be offered that can not otherwise be taken care of by operating lines. In this connection the question may arise as to the retention of these vessels as a naval reserve or for other military services. The original shipping act provides that vessels purchased, chartered, or leased from the board are required, except those described in section 4 of the bill, to operate under American registry and can not be sold to foreign account without the consent of the Shipping Board. This will keep all of these vessels in the American registry and subject to call in case of military necessity.

Section 8 of the bill authorizes the Shipping Board to sell any property transferred to it under section 2.

Section 9 of the bill covers the transfer of the appropriation and its continuance as it is now being handled to July 1, 1920. After July 1, 1920, this section requires that receipts from all sources shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States, except certain sums which shall be set aside by the board for operating expenses and for maintaining the insurance fund if it should be established. After July 1, 1920, regular appropriations can be made to this department the same as for other departments, and the amount of the appropriation can be limited to the necessity of maintaining the operations and the insurance fund if it is the desire of Congress not to go into any further purchasing or construction of vessels.

Section 10 of this bill is a provision which is contained in one of the appropriation bills repealed by this act, which does not require the War Department to make payment for the use of the Shipping Board vessels from July 1, 1918, to July 30, 1919.

Section 11 suspends all power of the Shipping Board to enlarge upon the housing program or other buildings in connection therewith; but authorizes the completion, if found desirable, of houses or buildings already begun, and further directs the board to dispose of their holdings in these houses as fast as practicable, so as to return to the United States Treasury the funds invested therein.

Section 12 of the bill provides for the delegation of powers by the United States Shipping Board if found advisable.

Section 13 describes the act as the shipping act of 1919.

As a new member of this committee, I have discovered that nothing short of endless application and tireless effort will enable a member of the committee to be of real service to the people of the country in building up a merchant marine. I have given the subject considerable study, and I am not in favor of Government ownership of the merchant marine. Of course, for a time it will be necessary to have the Shipping Board supervise the work of selling our ships and winding up the war program on the merchant marine, but I am convinced that, in the interest of all concerned, it would be better to have private capital invested in the merchant marine, where transportation charges would be regulated by competition, and the greater the competition the better, and under the policy adopted by this committee in selling our merchant vessels an opportunity is offered to establish a number of persons, partnerships, and corporations in the shipping business.

SHIPPING FACTS.

SALIENT FEATURES IN ACTIVITIES OF THE UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD FROM SEPTEMBER, 1918, TO SEPTEMBER, 1919.

On August 29, 1919, the total seagoing ship tonnage under control of the United States Shipping Board was as follows:

	Number of vessels.	Tonnage.
		Gross.	Dead-weight.
Built by the United States Shipping Board:
Steel	777	3,511,918	5,267,983
Wood	315	728,079	1,100,218
Composite	15	35,000	52,500
Seized from—
Germany	94	567,490	601,003
Austria	1	8,312	6,600
Purchased from—
Japan	15	85,880	128,820
Austria	5	30,521	29,506
Requisitioned from private owners	58	346,580	519,870

The foregoing tabulation does not include 122 steel ships of 465,745 (dead-weight) tons and 63 wood ships of 246,982 (dead-weight) tons, sold recently to private owners by the United States Shipping Board, nor seized foreign vessels that had been sunk.

At the outbreak of the world struggle merchant-marine construction had almost become a lost art in this country. To-day this Nation has more shipworkers, more shipyards, more shipways, more vessels under construction, and is turning them out more rapidly and in greater numbers than now issue from all the shipyards of all the world.

As the premier shipbuilding nation of the world America attained her place in one giant stride. Up to the outbreak of the war we had only 15 vessels of 1,000 tons engaged in over-sea trade. To-day the American flag floats from 1,280 ocean-going steamships, 1,107 of which have been built by the United States Shipping Board within the last two years.

In June, 1914, the total gross tonnage under the American flag, including coastwise shipping and the fleet operating on the Great Lakes, was 4,287,000 tons.

In June, 1919, its gross tonnage was 11,983,000, an increase of 278 per cent, chiefly in ocean-going steamships.

The steam tonnage under the American flag is now 24.8 per cent of the steam tonnage of the world. The figures are shown in the following tables:

The world steam tonnage of 100 gross tons and over on June 30, 1919, as reported by Lloyd's, was:

Number of vessels	24,386
Tonnage:
Gross	47,897,000
Dead-weight	71,845,500

American steam tonnage of 100 gross tons and over on June 30, 1919, including tonnage on Great Lakes, was:

Number of vessels	3,687
Tonnage:
Gross	11,983,000
Dead-weight	17,974,500

Per cent of world steam tonnage of 100 gross tons and over under United States flag, June 30, 1919:

Per cent of number	15.1

In the four years preceding the war the shipyards of this country turned out a total of 107 seagoing vessels of 1,500 tons and over, chiefly coastwise. This construction represented 805,037 dead-weight tons.

During 1918, a period when the Shipping Board was getting into its stride, there were launched from the yards under its control a total of 4,216,656 dead-weight tons, five times more than had been built in the four prewar years. During the year 1918 shipyards under control of the Shipping Board delivered 3,107,093 dead-weight tons of completed ships.

From January 1, 1919, to August 20, 1919, 3,983,135 dead-weight tons of shipping have been launched and 3,845,140 dead-weight tons delivered, a total for the 20 months (since the beginning of 1918) of 8,199,791 tons launched and 6,952,233 delivered.

The original construction program contemplated the building in this country of 17,807,071 dead-weight tons of shipping: 2,105 steel steamships, of 14,351,971 dead-weight tons; 1,017 wood steamships, of 2,978,100 dead-weight tons; 50 composite ships, of 175,000 dead-weight tons; and 43 concrete ships, of 302,000 dead-weight tons; a total of 3,215 ships.

Of this program there have been—

	Number.	Tonnage.
		Gross.	Dead-weight.
Delivered (inclusive of 1917, 1918, 1919):
Steel steamships	899	3,822,415	5,735,622
Wood steamships	378	892,735	1,339,103
Composite	15	35,000	52,500
Total	1,292	4,750,150	7,125,225
Fitting out in wet basins:
Steamships	408	1,280,483	1,920,724
On the ways:
Steel steamships	389	2,010,403	3,015,605
Wood steamships	99	138,000	207,000
Concrete steamships	9	42,333	63,500
Total	497	2,190,736	3,286,105
Under contract, work not begun:
Steel steamships	227	984,407	1,476,610
Contracts, canceled and suspended:
Steel steamships	421	2,051,956	3,077,935
Wood steamships	404	741,233	1,111,850
Composite steamships	32	74,667	112,000
Concrete steamships	29	142,333	213,500
Total	886	3,010,189	4,515,285

After subtracting 3,010,189 gross tons (4,515,285 dead-weight) of cancellations and suspensions, in order to complete the original program, this work yet remains to be done:

	Tonnage.
	Gross.	Dead-weight.
Completion of vessels launched, but not delivered	1,280,483	1,920,724
Completion of vessels whose keels have been laid	2,190,736	3,286,105
Completion of vessels under contract	984,407	1,476,610

Since August 31, 1918, the monthly deliveries have been as follows:

(This table includes 15 steel steamships of 85,880 gross tons delivered from Japanese shipyards.)

LAUNCHINGS.

In shipbuilding annals the month of July, 1918, was made notable by the record established that month in the launching of 124 steamships, representing 635,800 tons (dead-weight). That record was exceeded in May of this year, when 141 steamships, aggregating 723,958 tons (dead-weight), were launched.

The following table shows the launchings by month from August 31, 1918:

As a member of the Merchant Marine Committee, I realize that much depends upon the activities of that committee, and it is therefore vitally essential that each and every member of the committee become familiar with the shipping business. Unfortunately for me, I have never lived near navigable waters, and consequently my service to this committee has not been as efficient as I desire it should be. I have labored incessantly to acquaint myself with shipping facts, which I believe is essential to efficiency in service as a member of the committee.

Of course no definite or well-defined policy has been determined by the committee as yet touching this most important subject. This bill simply lays the preliminary foundation work necessary to the adoption of some definite policy.

I think I can see quite clearly that the establishment of a merchant marine on the part of the United States will have to do, in a great measure, with the future commercial welfare of this country. This bill, in my judgment, is worthy of the support of the entire membership of this House. The committee has spent a great deal of time in the preparation of it, and it has been discussed from every possible angle by members of the committee and Members of the House who are familiar with the shipping business.

The majority of our commerce has heretofore been transported by foreign ships and foreign merchant vessels. I think the time is here when we should transport our own goods to every country in the world, and use our own vessels to import goods from other countries into this country, and I am therefore strongly in favor of the establishment of a merchant marine second to no other in the world. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1373) to amend the Articles of War.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill H. R. 3143.

PROMOTION AND MAINTENANCE OF THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I came to Congress on a platform one plank of which declared for a strong Government-owned United States merchant marine, but I must confess that during the past two years my opinion on this subject has undergone a wonderful change. When we used to have our farmers sell a bale of cotton in Texas at 6 cents a pound, have it compressed and sent to Galveston, put on a ship, sent across to Liverpool at a time when the spinners over there were paying 20 cents a pound, the cost of sending a bale of cotton over there being approximately $1.50 a bale, I used to be unable to understand where the other 10 or 12 cents a pound profit in that bale of cotton went. My idea at that time was that the United States Government ought to be prepared with shipping facilities to act as a go-between to bring the farmers and the spinners together. That was my idea of an American merchant marine, and I then believed that it was necessary for same to be owned by the United States Government.

I want to say, however, that during the past two years, and during the past year especially, my conclusion is that it would be a bad policy on the part of this Government to own and operate anything outside of our Postal System. [Applause.]

I used to be in favor of Government ownership of railroads, but I want to say that if there is a man in this House further away from that proposition to-day than I am I do not know it. Why, if our Government continued to own these ships, we would at times have to commandeer men to run them or else have to turn over a new leaf in the House and let certain people understand that the Government was running the business, because otherwise the business would run the Government.

I want to see the United States get rid of the ships as fast as is consistent with good, sound, business judgment and business principles. Under proper regulations we can still have an ample United States merchant marine, privately owned but governmentally controlled. I can not quite agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], however distinguished he is, and however good business judgment he has, when this morning he intimated that because England has lately sold two ships, naming them, at £30 a ton, that we ought to adopt that as a criterion for what we should sell our vessels for. Why, to-day England is not selling any ships that amount to anything and are seaworthy.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. I simply named the price in answer to a question that was asked.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but I did not want the gentleman to put that into the RECORD as a criterion of what this board should sell our ships for. England is not selling ships now. If you investigate, you will find that these two boats that were mentioned by name England did not want. The kind of boats that are worth while for ocean traffic England is not selling but buying, and so is France buying, and Japan is buying, and others, in a market like there never was before in the history of the country for ships that are worthy to carry commerce across the ocean.

I happen to know that individuals who have been owners of ships have been clamoring down here before the Shipping Board for permission to be able to dispose of their own property, dispose of it not at prices they wanted some time ago but to sell at prices they never dreamed of before because of the prices that are being offered now by France, England, and Japan and other nations. I hope our country will get what our boats are worth when they are sold. And for the protection of our farmers and to enable them to get their products to market I hope that we will build up a strong, privately owned United States merchant marine, but I am against granting any subsidy because we can do it without subsidies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what may be the prevailing price of ships in England or here, but Mr. Hurley is authority in a recent communication for the statement that in England the best you can do on a contract for two years and six months delivery is a basic price of $150 a deadweight ton, plus whatever increase in labor and material may occur in the meantime. But I do not want to discuss that question particularly. This bill, in so far as it contains a policy at all, contains a wise one, and, so far as it goes, it will at least tend to countervail the real cause of the failure of the American merchant marine in prewar times and its gradual decay.

We now have a great deal of ship tonnage owned by the Government, built by the Government, and paid for by the Government. We have some 14,000,000 deadweight tons, and the Government is seeking, I think wisely, to put that under the control of private ownership, and they are purposing to do that by selling it at the world's market price to American citizens. So that as long as the Government has this supply of ships on hand, which it offers to our citizens at the world market price, our shipowners will pay no more for their ships, over which they will put our flag, than will their competitors pay for their ships over which the British or the Scandinavian or some other flag flies.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Does the Shipping Board sell these vessels direct or through an agent?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. We have not directed them in this bill, but their transactions have been direct.

Mr. CARSS. Have they paid a commission to any agent for selling these ships?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think not.

Mr. CARSS. Is the gentleman positive?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am not positive, but I have heard of no commission being paid or no commission being proposed. I want to say that that far the bill puts the American shipowner in a good attitude—that is, it enables him to buy his ship at the same price his competitor pays. I want to say, in respect to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, who referred to Texans as people with a chip on the shoulder, that he reminds me of some people who used to think that all people from Texas had hoofs and horns. Of course, down there we looked upon the matter and enjoyed it as a good joke, but I know that Texas will be delighted to have the gentleman from New York visit us so that he may know something hereafter.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman ought to mention the gentleman from New York by name, so as not to confuse the other Members from that State.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I refer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] who last spoke. Certainly most gentlemen from New York know something about Texas. But to get back to the bill. I do not believe there is a man in this House who is more anxious to see an American merchant marine prosper on the high seas than I am, and if my study of it has led me to believe that there is an inherent defect in our system and laws which would prevent the successful operation of a merchant marine, as long as it remained I think I would be unfaithful to my duty as a Member of Congress if I did not present it to the American people. I have always thought there was such a defect. We have always heard much talk about our high wages and the expensiveness of American operation. I do not believe that that had a thing in the world to do with our being driven from the seas. Now you are beginning to hear it said that the seamen's act did it, but our trade was driven from the seas 40 years before the seamen's act was passed. The inherent defect in our laws consisted in this: A man desiring to enter into the overseas trade and run a line of ships between New York and Liverpool or Southampton or Bremen or any of the Old World countries when he goes to start in finds that he can buy one of two ships; that he will have to pay $1,000,000 for one but that he can get the other for $600,000 and that the $600,000 ship is just as good as the million-dollar ship, the only difference being that one was built in America, the other in England. Over the million-dollar ship he can fly the American flag and over the other he can not. He finds that he can do everything under the British flag that he can under the American flag, so far as the trade he wishes to engage in is concerned; and as a business man he is going to buy the British ship for $600,000 and put a British flag over it and sail it. He will do that in the future as he has done in the past. Just as long as an American has to pay more for a ship to put the American flag on than he does for a ship to put any other flag on, he is going to buy the cheaper ship and put the other flag over it. If I could ever beat that fact into the commercial minds of the great industrial interests of America I think they would then find the key to unlock the problem of an American merchant marine. It is that the flag above the American ship must float over a ship that does not cost any more than a ship over which the British flag flies. We must equalize the cost of the ships. Our people might be able to compete, even though their ships cost more, but they will never try it because of the fact that a business man will not pay two prices for a thing which he wants to use if he can buy it for less money and use the cheaper article just as effectively. As I have said, if a man who wants to enter trade with Liverpool finds two ships just alike, ships that will equally serve his purpose, one he can buy for $600,000 and the other for $1,000,000, we all know that he will buy the cheaper ship. Now, for 40 years before the World War an American-built ship, which alone could fly the American flag, cost two prices. That fact alone caused our merchant marine to disappear from the seas, because even our own citizens bought foreign-built ships and put the flags of England and other countries over them and engaged in overseas trade under such flags in preference to buying higher-priced ships and putting our flag over them. So far as the original cost is concerned it may not amount to much in the operation of a ship. It may be a minor element in the matter of successful operation, but a man does not want to give away $400,000 in a million-dollar deal; he will not do it.

Since the seamen's act has been in operation and foreign seamen have the right to desert their ships when in our ports all the testimony shows that the cost of wages in English and American ships is practically the same. That has nothing to do with the situation. What about the cost of coal? Coal is cheaper here than it is in England. What about the cost of iron? Mr. Hurley says that iron is $5 a ton cheaper here than in England. And so for our future there is no reason why our shipbuilders can not build and our owners operate ships as cheaply as anybody. Certainly as long as the supply of ships that we have built lasts we will be able to sell, and this bill proposes to sell them to American merchants at a world market price, and therefore the American merchant may buy these ships and put the American flag over them if he wishes to go to sea.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. How will we arrive at the world's price?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The Shipping Board will arrive at it just as a merchant arrives at a world price of anything. Mr. Hurley has reported here that in England to-day you can contract for a ship at $150 per dead-weight ton, deliverable in two years and six months, and I think you will find that ships in England have sold for as high as $190 a ton that are ready to be delivered. If a ship to be delivered two years hence is worth $150 a ton, then a ship ready and in good condition to run now would be worth $200 a ton. The Shipping Board arrives at what a given ship would be worth in the world's market, just as a private individual would.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. As I understand it Japan is a great shipbuilding country. Do they not build ships cheaper there than in England?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. My judgment is that for some reason Japan has failed to beat England in building ships. For the same reason she would fail to beat us in building ships, but I can not go into that now. England prior to this war built ships not only for herself, but for all the world, and we can do the same thing. We have many advantages over England. We have the cheapest iron and steel, the material that goes into a ship, and we have the cheapest coal and timber, and, while we have higher wages to pay, we will build standardized ships and make many of the parts by wholesale and assemble them at assembleable points.

Now, as I have said, the truth is, even the cost of the ship does not enter largely into the ability to compete, but it is the other and incidental and overhead costs, the cost of ships making trips in ballast, the cost of unloading the ships, the cost of delays in port, and loss from light cargoes, and so forth. If you can get a ship that runs out with one full cargo and comes back laden with another, a ship which loses no time in the turn around, that ship will prosper, even if it costs twice as much to operate it as the other ships. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to my mind the most important matter, not only in connection with this legislation but in connection with the American merchant marine at this time, relates to the question of how quickly the ships now owned and controlled and operated by the Government can get into private hands. I think that is the crux of the situation right now. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has already referred to a question I asked Mr. Rosseter, Chief of the Bureau of Operations of the Shipping Board, in one of the hearings. I do not believe it is a violation of confidence to say that Mr. Rosseter rather favored a continued building program on the part of the Shipping Board for the purpose, as he stated it, of balancing our fleet. I think it is no violation of confidence also to say that the Shipping Board itself has not adopted any such program, and has no such purpose in view at the present time. Notwithstanding Mr. Rosseter's position on the question of further building of ships, when I asked him this question:

> Is it not a fact that as long as the Government continues to build and announces no policy with reference to the continuation of that program, that private capital shrinks from investing its funds in shipbuilding, and holds back to find out what the ultimate purpose and policy of the Government is going to be? Is not that the actual situation?

I asked Mr. Rosseter that question, and he replied without any hesitation, "Yes."

So long as the Government continues owning and operating these ships without any definite announcement of its policy, how can we expect private capital to go into competition with the Government, with its unlimited resources? For that reason this bill provides in section 3 that the ships shall be sold by the Shipping Board as speedily as possible, and we also set out the considerations to which the Shipping Board shall give attention in making these sales. I have not time to read that section again, but I urge every member of the committee to read section 3 for the purpose of ascertaining just what are the underlying principles upon which these sales shall be conducted. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] a moment ago said something in reference to the price announced for the sale of two ships in a London journal. I want to call attention to another statement in this same journal, the Nauticus, which is the leading maritime journal of England, in the issue of October 4, 1919. I read as follows:

> Notice is given that one firm of London ship-sale brokers have recently been successful in disposing of some 25 new standard steamers from the ministry of shiping, aggregating about 180,000 tons dead-weight for about £4,500,000. The largest is of 11,500 tons capacity, fitted with refrigerating machinery, with a speed of 13 knots, at about £425,000, and the smallest of 5,150 tons and 11 knots at about £145,000. The vessels have been sold to English owners.

Here is a sale of 25 ships ready for spot delivery at these prices. The largest vessel, of 11,500 tons capacity, was sold for £425,000. At the present rate of exchange that price in this country would be $157.25 per ton. That shows the condition of the market price in England, and we say in section 3 of this bill that the Shipping Board shall take into consideration the prevailing domestic and foreign market price. Let us not be scared by this proposition of a possible loss upon these ships. There has been a great deal of unrest in the country recently, which, to my mind, has grown out of the fact that we have forgotten the pledges and the promises which we made to ourselves and to the Nation during the war. We said that we would pay the price of the war. One of the prices of the war is the high cost of living to-day. Another of the prices of the war to this Nation will be the loss upon these ships. We built those ships for emergency purposes. We built them in order to win the war. We paid enormous wages and prices for materials, and necessarily made losses upon the building of those ships. Now we are expected and required to pay the price, and a part of that price will be the loss which we will sustain upon the sale of these ships, and to my mind it should not be the main purpose, upon the part of the administration or upon the part of the Congress, to recoup the exact amount which was expended for the building of these ships. Let us sell them as speedily as possible, get them into the market, get them out upon the high seas under private ownership and private operation, to the end that the dreams which all of us have had and the hopes and aspirations of the American people may be realized once again—to see afloat upon the seas of the world a merchant marine operated and controlled by American capital and by American citizenship. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., (a) That the following acts and parts of acts are hereby repealed, subject to the limitations and exceptions hereinafter provided:

(1) The portion designated "Emergency shipping fund" of the act entitled "An act making appropriation for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, as amended by the act entitled "An act to amend the emergency shipping fund provisions of the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 15, 1917, so as to empower the President and his designated agents to take over certain transportation systems for the transportation of shipyard and plant employees, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1918, and by the act entitled "An act making appropriation to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes," approved November 4, 1918;

(2) Section 3 of such act of April 22, 1918;

(3) The paragraphs numbered 2 and 3 under the heading "Emergency shipping fund" in such act of November 4, 1918; and

(4) The act entitled "An act to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes," approved July 18, 1918.

(b) The repeal of such acts or parts of acts is subject to the following limitations:

(1) All contracts or agreements entered into before the passage of this act under any such act or part of act shall be assumed and carried out by the United States Shipping Board, hereinafter called "the board."

(2) All rights, interests, or remedies accruing or to accrue as a result of any such contract or agreement or of any action taken in pursuance of any such act or part of act shall be in all respects as valid, and may be exercised and enforced in like manner, subject to the provisions of subdivision (c) of this section, as if this act had not been passed;

(3) The repeal shall not have the effect of extinguishing any penalty incurred under such act or part of act, which shall remain in force for the purpose of sustaining a prosecution for the enforcement of such penalty.

(c) As soon as practicable after the passage of this act the board shall adjust, settle, liquidate, and wind up all matters arising out of or incident to the exercise by or through the President of any of the powers or duties conferred or imposed upon the President by any such act or part of act; and for this purpose the board, instead of the President, shall have and exercise any of such powers and duties relating to the determination and payment of just compensation.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out the word "appropriation" and insert in lieu thereof "appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriation."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 10, strike out the figures "1919" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1917."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 1, line 6, after the word "The," strike out "portion designated 'emergency shipping fund'" and insert "emergency shipping fund provision."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this does not change the meaning of the language, but it uses the same language which the committee uses on page 2 of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 2, line 7, after the word "and," to insert the words "as further amended."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: On page 1, line 7, after the word "and," insert "as further amended."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. On page 2, line 22, I see the following language used in paragraph 1:

All contracts or agreements entered into before the passage of this act under such act or part of act shall be assumed and carried out by the United States Shipping Board, hereinafter called "the board."

Does not the gentleman think it better to say "all contracts or agreements lawfully entered into"? It might be the Shipping Board has entered into contracts not authorized by the different acts we have heretofore passed.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, then I offer, on line 22, after the word "agreements," to insert the word "lawfully," so that it will read "all contracts or agreements lawfully entered into."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 2, line 22, after the word "agreements," insert the word "lawfully."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That, in order that the merchant vessels now owned or controlled by the United States may be returned to or placed under private ownership and operation, and to the end that an efficient merchant marine, adequate to meet the requirements of our ocean-borne commerce and to serve as a naval auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, may be established and operated by citizens of the United States, the board is hereby authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, to citizens of the United States (as defined in section 2 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended), except as provided in section 4, all of the vessels referred to in section 2, or otherwise acquired by the board. Such sale shall be made at such prices and on such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe, but the completion of the payment of the purchase price shall not be more than 10 years after the making of the contract of sale. The board is authorized to take into consideration, in fixing the sale price of such vessels, the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of and demand for vessels, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts, on behalf of the committee, offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 1, after the word "than," strike out "10" and insert in lieu thereof "15."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman state what is the purpose of increasing the time of payment?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will. The idea was that it was thought it might help the sale of the vessels to take 25 per cent down when selling and get a percentage each year, the balances to spread over 15 years instead of 10, which would be likely to aid the sale of the ships.

Mr. WALSH. It might be that some of these ships would not last out the period of payment.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Well, they are insured. If they fall to pieces, which I do not think they will, we would be perfectly safe.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think, by embarking upon this policy, it is wise to make terms as easy as can be done under the circumstances?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I think so. Considering the high taxation and everything else, I think it far better to make it that way.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts on behalf of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts: Page 5, line 5, after the word "costs" strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 5, line 8, after the word "sold" insert: "All sales made under the authority of this act shall be subject to the limitations and restrictions of section 9 of the shipping act of 1916 as amended."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply makes clear that the sales the board shall make of these ships shall be subject to the restrictions of the original shipping act. It may not be clear if we permitted these sales unless you mentioned the shipping act, inasmuch as this is subsequent legislation, and a corporation or individual might buy these ships to-day and to-morrow transfer them to some foreign interest. The original shipping act in section 9 prohibits that, and also prohibits the sale of these vessels without the consent of the Shipping Board. Inasmuch as this is subsequent legislation, covering a comprehensive scheme for the future, it might well be contended that where no reference was made to the original act and no limitations were contained in the language, the Shipping Board could sell these vessels to a citizen to-day who would be at liberty to-morrow to sell them to an alien or some foreign interest.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the committee had that matter in mind when framing the bill, and this section simply provides for the sale of these vessels to American citizens. It does not in any way limit the power vested in the Shipping Board under section 9 of the shipping act to prevent the ships from being sold by American citizens to go under foreign flags. But if there is any possible question about it, this is the time to make it clear, and so far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment: Page 4, line 22, after the figure "4," insert the words "of this act," and after the figure "2," in the same line, insert the words "of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 2, after the figure "4," insert "of this act," and after the figure "2," in the same line, insert "of this act."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment on page 3, line 13, after the word "settle," to strike out the words "liquidate, and wind up," and add the words "and liquidate." It seems to me that is superfluous language.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman will have to get unanimous consent to return to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. That section has been disposed of.

Mr. CROWTHER. I ask unanimous consent, then, Mr. Chairman, to return to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to section 1. Is there objection?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CROWTHER: On page 3, line 13, after the word "settle," strike out the words "liquidate, and wind up," and insert in lieu thereof the words "and liquidate."

Mr. ALEXANDER. That may be better language.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to return to that section?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the section on page 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment to section 3.

Mr. BLANTON. On page 5, line 1, after the word "years," insert "such deferred indebtedness to be paid in equal annual installments."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 5, line 1, after the word "years," insert "such deferred payments to be made in equal annual installments."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, one gentleman on the committee made a statement on the floor here a few minutes ago to the effect that while the estimated life of a vessel was 20 years, that he had evidence to offer showing that the life of some vessels was 12 years, and that there were certain shipping interests who, after they had used a vessel 12 years, were then through with it and were ready to junk it. That was a statement, I believe, of one gentleman on the committee, who seemed to speak with authority.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. I have only five minutes. I want to direct the attention of the committee to the amendment. Now, if that is the case, we have just adopted an amendment here which gives private purchasers 15 years in which to pay for these vessels. Suppose the Shipping Board, or rather this new board that we are creating, should under that direction see fit to sell a vessel without taking very much cash in payment. Suppose a purchaser should owe practically all of the consideration, and the board should see fit to defer all of the payments to the end of the 15-year period. If the best life of a vessel, in the view of some of the shipping companies, is only 12 years, what kind of a security would this Government have at the end of 15 years for the consideration price of that vessel? I think there should be a direction to this board to the effect that when they sell one of these ships they must either require, say, at least a sufficient cash consideration to make the security good, or they should require a certain payment to be made every year in order that the security should not be lost to the Government.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Should not that amendment be adopted at the end of the sentence rather than after the word "years," in line 1?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not care as to that. I want to see the Government properly secured. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to add my amendment after the word "sale," as just suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. CROWTHER. I want to say to the gentleman, regarding the 12-year proposition, that the evidence was that the shell of the vessel still had many years of service but that the vessel had to be renovated principally as to the propulsive power, the engines and machinery.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but if you will talk to any shipowner, to anyone who is familiar with the business, like our friend from New York [Mr. CLEARY], he will tell you that whenever you go to renovating an old ship you had better go out into the market and buy a new one, because whenever you try to fix up an old hull you are going to spend more money and have less to show for it when you get through than if you go into the market and buy a new ship.

Mr. KNUTSON. Did the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY] make that statement?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I see he has come into the Hall. I did not know he was here. He can speak for himself. I should like to yield to him, because I know that he knows something about ships.

Mr. CLEARY. Just to relieve the gentleman's mind, I will say that 24 years would not be as much as the average life of a ship.

Mr. BLANTON. I was taking the statement of a member of the committee on that point, and I presumed that he knew more about it than I did. Of course if he was wrong in his hypothesis, I am not responsible for that. I am glad that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY] is here. He is one of the gentlemen from New York who stays here all the time. He does not come in simply when we have a daylight-saving proposition or a liquor proposition up before the House. He is always here, and I am glad of it. [Applause and laughter.] I am glad of it, because he helps us out with good suggestions and advice.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not believe it would be advisable to pass this amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. There may be many different ways that the Shipping Board may have of handling the sale of these ships. I certainly do not believe the Shipping Board would sell a ship on a 15-year term with all the payments to be made in the last year. Certainly, that would lay them open to very severe criticism, and I know they do not want that criticism. There are a number of different ships that are to be sold. There are the wooden ships. They are offering to sell those hulls that are unfinished for $75,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman means $75 a ton, does he not?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; they are offering the unfinished wooden hulls without machinery for $75,000. That was advertised the other day in the newspapers. Now, if we go and limit the way in which these ships may be sold, we may prevent some very advantageous cash sales, and I do not think we ought in the House here to say to the Shipping Board in a very strict manner that they have got to do thus and so in selling these ships. It is an ordinary mercantile proposition, and they should have as much leeway as possible in the legislation that we give them.

Mr. TILSON. Is there not a provision in the original shipping act requiring 25 per cent cash?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; there is no provision regarding 25 per cent.

Mr. TILSON. So, referring to that act there is no additional limitation over what is contained in section 3 of this act.

Mr. EDMONDS. None at all. They may sell ships on 5 or 10 year terms, but we say that the limit of time within which they shall sell these ships is 15 years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The contract of sale provides for an insurance during the lifetime of the contract, and undoubtedly it will provide for the upkeep of the property during that time.

Mr. EDMONDS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman evidently has more confidence in a Shipping Board run by a Democratic administration than the gentleman from Texas has.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but Mr. Hurley is a Republican.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Payne is the head of the Shipping Board, and he is a Democrat. I am not bringing politics into this thing at all. There is no necessity for it. I consider that most servants of the Government are at least fairly honest, and I hope they are whether they are Democrats or Republicans.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is there not danger that in the event the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is adopted some one may come along and say, "This act gives me a right to 15 years in which to pay for a vessel"?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; whereas the Shipping Board might want to give him only five years.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Shipping Board requires 25 per cent cash, and the remainder within five years; hence we shall be doing a very foolish thing if we provide in this bill that ships may be sold on a 15-year basis, and that the deferred payments shall be made on the basis of one-fifteenth annually.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that is true.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman know why the sale of that $100,000,000 worth of ships has not been completed?

Mr. EDMONDS. Because the gentleman who undertook the sale of them as an agent could not sell them. Nobody would buy them at the price. Mr. Anderson has been in Europe for six months endeavoring to sell the ships at $225 a ton, on which he was to get a commission of 1 per cent, and he is over there at his own expense, and he has been unable to sell one ship at that price.

Mr. BRIGGS. The Shipping Board still operates them, then?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. There has been no sale at all, then, in that transaction?

Mr. EDMONDS. Absolutely no sale. They have reported to the public 100 ships sold, but they have not sold one.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is the Shipping Board bound in any way so that it could not sell its ships to anybody else?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not know; they said they would sell 100 ships at a commission of 1 per cent, and it was blazoned out in the newspapers that they had sold 100 ships, but they never did sell them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be a great mistake if this proposed amendment was adopted. It would be construed so that if the Shipping Board should sell these vessels under annual payments that the purchaser would have the right to demand that such payments should all be equal. As a matter of fact, the Shipping Board ought to require larger payments at first than later on. Now is the time that the profits are going to be made. Later on the shipping rates are going very much lower.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman will yield, they are now selling vessels on the basis of requiring larger payments at first because the earnings in the next two years will be larger than later on.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; naturally they would require a larger payment at first than later on. They ought to require a substantial cash payment upon delivery. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, my experience is that 15 years is too long a time to have these payments spread over. When people buy these vessels they expect to pay for them in 5 years. I think 10 years is amply sufficient, and nobody expects to run 15 years in the payment for a ship. The chances are that if they got a good rate of business they would pay for it the next year. Boats have paid for themselves in one voyage during the war. There has been an immense amount of money made in that way. I think it is unwise to run it over 15 years. I do not want to interfere with the committee, but, listening to the discussion here, I think it would be unwise to continue it 15 years.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will understand that that part has been adopted and disposed of. Now, Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is voted down it will be in the discretion of the board to make it 5 years or 8 years or even 3 years, and require a cash payment. Therefore I think the amendment ought to be rejected. We can assume that the Shipping Board will get the best terms possible; that they will get as much cash as they can, and arrange the deferred payments so that the Government will be reasonably certain to get the purchase price before the vessel sold is worn out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a pro forma amendment just to say a word. I am not an expert on shipping matters. I have greatly enjoyed the consideration of this bill to-day. It has been conducted in good temper and I have received valuable information. The committee, it seems, is a unit, and I suspect that the bill ought to be enacted substantially as reported.

There has been a little said about our future prospects for a merchant marine. There are many forces that operate, many have operated in the past, many during the war, and many will be in the interest of the United States and the countries of the world in the next decade.

I came here in the Forty-third Congress. I was a young fellow that read the New York Weekly Tribune as early as 1848. It arrived once a week out on the Wabash. I recollect that about that time was the beginning of the decay of our merchant marine, which was built of wood before the days of iron and steam-propelled ships. Great Britain, I think, and other large countries were going to iron, and we, as I recollect from the newspaper articles, decided to follow suit.

The Collins Line was built. I do not recollect whether their ships were purchased or manufactured in our own shipyards at that time, but they carried the American flag. There was a cry for subsidies. It was under Democratic rule at that time, with full power, and subsidies were granted to the Collins Line. I am not here to criticize it, but there were scandals. Great Britain and other nations were offering subsidies. It ran along and our merchant marine more and more disappeared.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like the benefit of the gentleman's judgment as to the real basic reason for the decay of the American merchant marine in those days.

Mr. CANNON. The real basic reason was that we could not compete in construction and could not compete in operation with the world. It was not so much in the construction, for that was to some extent negligible, but in the operation we could not compete, because it cost us more with a new world and a new country for labor than it did the old countries. There were greater rewards in this country in labor on land than in labor on the seas for our own people. We were just beginning the development of this country. There were many reasons why we failed in holding an American merchant marine. One was that the bulk of the population was East, in New England and down the coast. There was no Texas; the land was there, but it was under Mexican domination. Greater reward from that time to the present time in the United States has come in the development of the country.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not the gentleman recall that our merchant marine in the time he speaks of, when Texas was under the Mexican dominion, was in its most prosperous condition, and that we then carried 70 per cent of our commerce?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, nay, nay; I am speaking now of 1848, 1849, and 1850; our merchant marine gradually dwindled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. More and more, year by year, the wooden ships had gone out of business. One of the factors is that our railway system, now comprising as it does nearly one-half of the railways of the world, has been developed since 1850. Why, I never saw a railway locomotive until 1853. You could not go as far west as St. Louis on a railroad until 1852. We had only 30,000 miles of railroad when the Civil War began, and we had at that time only 31,000,000 of people—men, women, and children, black and white. The marvelous development in this country brought greater rewards to efficiency and the labor on land—and I speak of all kinds of labor, for I am sick and tired of this word "labor" being applied only to the man who works with his hands. Everyone who is worth three whoops in that place which burns with fire and brimstone is a laborer and everyone is a capitalist who is of any account. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he leaves that subject?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The iron and steel epoch succeeded the wooden epoch in shipbuilding. What figure is the concrete ship going to cut with respect to the world shipping?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know; I can not tell. Good Lord, we do not know what is going to happen in the next generation and in the next century. I am a pretty old man and I am not afraid to die, but oh, how I would like to live throughout the swing of this twentieth century merely to see what happens. [Applause.]

When this war broke out we did not have much of a merchant marine. The wooden ships had largely all gone, and we would not have had any merchant marine, in my judgment, if it had not been that we monopolized the coastwise trade of the United States, and a wonderful trade it was. As we developed 20,000,000 people up to 110,000,000 people——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Our coastwise trade was a monopoly. No ship could engage in the coastwise trade, from Maine to Alaska, unless it was constructed in an American yard. We could not compete; we had not yet arrived at that time where we could compete with Great Britain in the construction of ships. Of course, the construction of the Navy was Government owned, although we did construct ships for the Navy in American yards by contract a little later on.

A few years ago—and I am not criticizing anybody, but merely calling attention to it as a fact—not a great while ago we extended the coastwise trade to ships wherever they were built, constructed in foreign shipyards. I did not vote for that; I think it was a mistake. I understand that before a great while we will go back to a monopoly of that coastwise trade. That will assure us, whatever may happen, that we can sustain some of our shipyards. [Applause.] If that is not already done, I hope it will be done. Some one said that we could operate ships on the world's highways, so far as the labor cost is concerned, within 10 per cent of what it costs the world.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no; I made the statement that the labor cost constituted but 10 per cent of the entire expense.

Mr. CANNON. Oh! We pay our seamen, American born, more than Japan pays hers, and something more, I do not know how much, than Great Britain pays hers.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The testimony before our committee is that since the passage of the seamen's act foreign ships going out of New York, English and other European ships, pay the same wages that ours do.

Mr. CANNON. I am very glad to hear that, if it is so. But if you let them go into our coastwise trade you will find a different proposition. So much for that. I am not going to talk about the seamen's act; I have my opinion about it. I am in favor of the best possible wages that can be paid on land and on sea and for production, whether a man sails on a ship or works in a mine, but it must not be discriminative against the United States so that we can not function.

When I came to Congress they were paying subsidies to ships. There were great scandals about the Pacific Mail. We had investigations galore and some of the charges were well founded, as I recollect. I prepared a bill from the Post Office Committee. One was pending there for a subsidy for carrying the mails. History repeats itself. The evidence showed that Great Britain and other countries with their colonial possessions sailed their ships at much less than we paid our seamen, so practically we were driven from the sea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the bill and move to strike out the last word. I am very much in favor of this bill as a private citizen and as a Member of Congress. I have favored a merchant marine for many, many years, and following up the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I think it is a good opportunity to state something which it seems to me is pertinent to the consideration of this bill, as far as the future is concerned. I hope this bill will be passed, but let us assume that it is passed and that private American citizens have all of this tonnage in their possession.

Is there anybody in this House who believes that these vessels can be operated without further legislation than this? I believe that I will indulge in prophecy and say that the wooden vessels will rot out and that the steel vessels will rust out unless you pass legislation that will equalize conditions that prevail in the operation of oceanic commerce. We must not look at theories, but cold facts. Now, I do not know where the gentleman got his statistics from—I mean the gentleman from Texas—who remarked that foreign vessels sailing out of New York were manned and equipped for the same price as American vessels. Mr. Hurley no longer than some time this summer past—I think in July—published a pamphlet in which he stated this fact: That for a 5,000-ton ship to go a certain number of miles manned by Japanese it would cost $750. That same vessel manned by Englishmen or under English auspices and traveling the same number of miles would cost $1,250; that same vessel manned and equipped according to American standards would cost $3,000. Now, I say to you that you can not maintain an American merchant marine—unless the International Labor Congress establishes an international equal-wage amount, and that is nothing but a pipe dream—you can not man these vessels, you can not keep them on the water, you can not make them float on the seven seas until you gentlemen on that side and you gentlemen on this side of the House make up your minds to look the question fairly in the face and determine to equalize the conditions that do exist as a fact, and that can only be done by a subsidy, and no other way. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I will wait until the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the board is hereby authorized and empowered to sell to aliens, at such prices and on such terms and conditions as it may determine, subject to the same limitation as to completion of time of payments as provided in section 3, such vessels as it shall deem unnecessary to the promotion and maintenance of an efficient merchant marine.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] made a very interesting speech about our merchant marine, and suggested a proposition that I feel sure that sooner or later we will meet as a legislative proposition, to wit, to keep our merchant marine on the high seas by means of a Government subsidy. I feel sure we are going to face that proposition sooner or later, because I believe that we are undertaking to build up under the abnormal conditions which now exist a larger merchant marine than can be operated as a safe economic proposition in competition with the world. Now, let us go back and review a little the situation that existed before the war. We will, I am sure, recall that the United States exported less manufactured products than we imported, but by reason of our export of raw materials, such as cotton, wheat, meat products, and things of that sort, there was annually a large balance of trade in our favor. How was that balance of trade settled? It was settled practically by two items. One was that Europe owned three or four billion dollars of our securities and, of course, we owed them the annual interest charge on that amount. Now, in addition to that the most of our foreign trade was carried in English and German and Scandinavian bottoms, and the cost of that service was also a large item in settling our balance of trade, and those two items, to wit, that of interest on securities which the people of European nations owned and the pay for the service that was rendered by their merchant marine, were the items that settled the balance of trade. Now, we all know, there is not a Member of this Congress who does not know, that there will be no way under Heaven that we can continue to carry on the foreign trade that we are now carrying on unless Europe can find some way to settle the heavy balance of trade which is against them outside of sending gold to us, or a continuance of extending credits. Now, for a period of time we, of course, know we will have to continue the extension of foreign credits, at least until Europe can get on her feet and go to producing, and that is why we passed the Edge bill yesterday, which has for its purpose the permission for the incorporation of concerns to finance foreign trade, especially in the way of credits, but we all know there must be a limit to it some time or other, and I contend that if Europe can operate a merchant marine at less cost than we can, while I would not abandon the idea of having a certain amount of United States marchant marine as an auxiliary to our Navy, still I think that it would be exceedingly unwise for us to try to build up such a merchant marine as that in order to carry it on; it would have to be heavily subsidized. I do not believe in subsidizing private industry, and if it turns out that we must come to that, then I favor Government ownership of whatever merchant marine it would be prudent for us to have. Now, another thing——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK. Now, a good deal has been said upon the floor of the House as to how we can keep our merchant marine on the high seas and how we can prevent it from being driven out of commerce. Now, I contend, and I do not want to evidence any partisan politics at all, but I contend that if the old traditional policy of the Republican Party is sought to be continued into effect, to wit, that of high protection so as to prevent imports into this country, we can not expect to keep our merchant marine on the high seas. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

For instance, suppose a ship loads at the port of New Orleans with cotton, one of our chief raw materials, and goes to an English port, or to a German port, and is unable to get a return cargo to the United States and has to come back in ballast, do you suppose that we can continue to keep that ship upon the high seas? It is done at the present time by reason of the unprecedented high freight rates, and they can afford to make hasty trips to Europe and make no effort to get a return cargo and come back in ballast, but that situation can not continue. What policy do the Republicans propose in order to meet the situation? Why, we have seen them bring forward a bill at this session and pass it in the House which puts such a high tariff on dyestuffs that they can not come into the United States at all unless the licensing board would be a mind to permit it. Even high protectionists, like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], fought this licensing provision, and said it was a vicious thing to do. The bill has not yet passed the Senate, but it met with the ready approval of the Republicans in the House. I have heard considerable said about another proposition, and I understand probably that it has received favorable consideration by the Republican Members of the Ways and Means Committee, and that is to put such a tariff on potash that would keep it out of the United States from the great mines in Alsace and Saxony, and undertake to build up the potash industry in this country by such uneconomical methods as to go out into the alkali lakes and pump the brines for several miles through pipe lines to evaporating and kiln drying plants, so that commercial potash can be made of it; and then another method which is being sought to be developed is to go to kelp beds and harvest kelp and make potash at a cost of $400 a ton. Of course these methods were justifiable as war measures, but it would be foolish to try and foster uneconomic industries like this after the war is over by means of a higher protective tariff. If we are going to carry on trade with France, and of course we are, why not let her pay part of what she will owe us by means of potash from her great potash mines in Alsace and enable our farmers to buy it at a reasonable price, rather than to try to foster an industry of potash making in this country which can not find a sound economic basis to rest upon. If we are going to sell Germany some of our raw materials, and of course we are, why not buy some of her dyestuffs which her people can produce so economically and efficiently.

The truth of the matter is that if we are to carry on our foreign trade we must be willing to trade with those nations which can produce certain commodities under a more economic process than we can produce them, and we will sell them the articles and commodities which we can best produce. It is perfectly absurd to think we can build up a foreign trade on a one-sided basis.

Mr. BLANTON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BLACK. In just a moment.

Now, upon this question of high protective tariff, I want to read you a little item that I think is very significant. I clipped it one day this week:

Wall Street Journal states that A. B. Johnson, former president of Baldwin Locomotive Works, favors downward revision of tariff, suggests United States needs foreign trade, which in ultimate analysis is exchange of commodities. Believes chemical and other infant industries require a high protective tariff but giant industries like steel do not.

Mr. BUTLER. I know about that. Mr. Chairman, may I——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to have a colloquy on that with you. I know all about it.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was very much interested in the speech delivered by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON]. I am in favor of this bill, but I am very much interested in knowing how we are going to keep the vessels on the sea after we dispose of them to private owners. My notion is, and my guess is, and my prediction is that you will never keep them on the seas unless you give them a subsidy.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The more we feed the popular mind with that notion the less we can expect of efficiency from the American people.

Mr. EMERSON. I think not.

Mr. LAYTON. In reply to that statement, I want to say that there is no lack of efficiency on the part of England. She has been granting subsidies. There is no lack of subsidies so far as Japan is concerned. In fact, her efficiencies are so great that they have been able to control the seas.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman is one of the most efficient Members of this House, and I always like to listen to efficient men. With all due respect to what my distinguished friend on the other side says, the fact remains that our merchant marine was driven from the sea after the Civil War, and you can not keep it upon the sea while the expense of running American ships exceeds the expense of running ships by other countries. An American merchant and exporter may be very patriotic. Some one said to-day that he would send his goods in American ships if he could do it at the same price, but if he can send them in somebody else's ships at a less price he is very apt to do so.

My good friend from Texas [Mr. BLACK] talked a little on protection. I am a protectionist, a dyed-in-the-wool protectionist, and I would place a tariff upon every article in this country that we do not produce but could produce high enough to compel its production.

Mr. BAER. Is it not true that the gentleman who was quoted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] wants to reduce wages, and that is the reason he wants to reduce the tariff?

Mr. EMERSON. That is true; and you can not maintain a high standard of American wages without giving the American workingman an advantage over all foreign workingmen.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think that in order to successfully develop our merchant marine they have got to have a return cargo from foreign ports?

Mr. EMERSON. That is true, of course; but if you can not get the return cargo, you can not get it. I have heard a great deal here that the reason of the loss in carrying these cargoes about is because we spent so much time at the docks and can not get the return cargo. If you can not get the return cargoes, you can not get them.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I want to call attention to the fact that before the Civil War we carried the bulk of the goods of the world in American ships and that we carried them under a high protective tariff.

Mr. EMERSON. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. On the question of labor, is it not a fact that when we on this side of the House attempted to provide in the magnesite bill that a certain amount of this subsidy should be paid to labor that produced it, the gentleman's colleagues on the other side voted down the amendment? Is not that the fact?

Mr. EMERSON. I do not recall that fact. I am talking about no particular case, but generally. I did not oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Can not the gentleman take time on the next section?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I would prefer to proceed now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON], who seems to think that the question of wages cuts a great figure in the operation of our merchant marine, I want to read the testimony of Mr. Rosseter before our committee. He was the chairman of the operating board, and I think he knows more about this business than anybody else connected with the business. Mr. Rosseter is not now connected with the Shipping Board, but when he was before our committee he made this statement:

Mr. ROSSETER. The first time I ventured to send a ship out in the East India trade, which, by the way, was very much resented by our British friends, I sent out a 7,000-ton cargo ship. In making the round voyage on the theory of an outward and homeward cargo she would have carried 14,000 tons—7,000 outward and 7,000 homeward. Instead of that, her freight list showed she handled 27,000 tons on the voyage, which was explained by the fact that 13,000 tons was way-to-way business. She went to Manila and discharged a certain amount of cargo there and replaced it with cargo for Singapore; she went to Singapore and landed cargo and replaced it with cargo for Calcutta; she took a cargo at Calcutta for Colombo, from Colombo to Singapore, to Siam, and to Manila. In fact, in that constant interchange she carried on the one voyage 27,000 tons.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Rosseter, is it not a fact if the cargo space can be continually filled by profitable freight that that is a greater question than the cost of wages or anything else connected with the successful operation of the ships?

Mr. ROSSETER. Absolutely; it is the dominating factor.

Mr. HARDY. And also the length of time required to fill in this cargo; that is, to load and unload?

Mr. ROSSETER. Very important—dispatch.

Mr. HARDY. Now, is it or not a fact that the difference between the English and American wages would sink into insignificance in comparison with the good or bad management of the operation of the ships belonging to English and American companies?

Mr. ROSSETER. That is quite true. I put the difference in wages very far down in the scale of importance.

I have read that, Mr. Chairman, simply to show——

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to offer a word or two?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will allow you to speak if you will ask a question.

Mr. LAYTON. Does the gentleman want me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not particularly wish the gentleman to ask me a question, but——

Mr. LAYTON. I want to make a rejoinder to the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Very well; the gentleman will have an opportunity. Several witnesses that came before us said that after the seamen's act went into effect, increasing the wages of the seamen employed in our merchant marine, the tendency was to increase wages of the seamen on foreign ships. Our last advance was made in July and August, and they were said to be approaching again. It did not apply precisely to the Asiatic or Japanese ships, because they were run under Government operation. The English vessels coming to American ports were paying almost precisely the same wage as American vessels, and Mr. Rosseter says the difference between the English and American scale of wages amounts practically to nothing. The question is, Will good management constantly secure the filling of cargo space and good methods of navigation? If you get a good manager, he goes out loaded, and goes out to a foreign port and exchanges some of his commodities for commodities he finds in that port, and continues his voyage everywhere profitably, whereas if you go in ballast and hang up 15 days in harbor and encounter these enormous delays and expenses, you lose. No matter how much your ship costs, no matter how much your wages cost, you can not operate the vessel profitably. The great thing is to manage the vessel efficiently and get cargo.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the chairman or some member of the committee if he has any information as to how many vessels and what character of vessels have already been sold to foreign interests by the Shipping Board or Fleet Corporation?

Mr. EDMONDS. That may probably be in the sheets, but I have not looked at it.

Mr. WALSH. Has the committee taken any testimony on that point?

Mr. EDMONDS. The report I had on August 30 did not show any vessels sold to foreign interests.

Mr. WALSH. Have the vessels that have been sold to foreign interests been only those that have not been deemed necessary by the board for the making of an efficient American merchant marine?

Mr. EDMONDS. The only sales were the 100 vessels sold to the Anderson people.

Mr. WALSH. That is the Scandinavian company?

Mr. EDMONDS. No. That is the man who said he would go to Europe and sell these vessels at $225 a ton. We have no record of his selling any vessel.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any record of Scandinavian interests securing vessels built in our yards during the war?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think you will probably find that these vessels were sold by the shipyards to the Scandinavian interests and released by the Shipping Board.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the gentleman is quite correct in that. I think there have been sold vessels to certain Scandinavian interests that are necessary for the operation of an efficient American merchant marine. Now, what I would like to know is what character of vessels these are that you authorized to be sold.

Mr. EDMONDS. On page 7657 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there is a list or recapitulation of the ship sales on October 20, 1919. In that there is no vessel positively sold that has been sold to a foreign interest. It is probable that the ships the gentleman is thinking about are the 100 ships sold to Anderson, that were supposed to be sold to foreign interests. I understand that Mr. Anderson has been in Sweden and Norway and in France and Italy and in Spain endeavoring to sell these vessels.

Mr. WALSH. Now, will the gentleman state what particular type of vessel the Shipping Board has in mind which they can deem unnecessary to the promotion and continuance of an efficient merchant marine?

Mr. EDMONDS. The Anderson corporation made a contract to take 100 of what are known as lake-type vessels. They were vessels of from 3,500 to 4,000 tons. They were vessels constructed somewhat on the lake plan, and they were not considered as desirable vessels for the overseas trade. They were more of the character of a vessel to be used in the coastwise business.

Mr. WALSH. They have built quite a number of them?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think they have built considerably more than 100 of them on the Lakes.

Mr. WALSH. And they have built a lot in the coastwise shipping plants.

Mr. EDMONDS. Not of this type.

Mr. WALSH. Of 3,500 tons?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, of 3,500 tons; but not of this type. This type was built so that it could be brought through the Welland Canal. It is not deep enough.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman understands that it is only that kind of vessel that the Shipping Board would be authorized to sell?

Mr. EDMONDS. Wooden ships, concrete ships, composite ships, or vessels of that size. That is not a desirable size for the overseas trade. It is desirable only for a portion of the business of the world.

Mr. WALSH. Did the gentleman say concrete ships?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. I think they are offering them. The concrete ship has been fairly successful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. In line 14, after the word "efficient," insert the word "American."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin: Page 5, line 14, after the word "efficient," insert the word "American."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. We have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That if the terms and conditions of any sale include deferred payments of the purchase price, the board (in order that the United States may be protected against loss, liability, or damage, and have additional security for the payment of the balance of the purchase price and charges) shall require, as part of the terms and conditions, that the purchaser of the vessel shall keep the same insured (a) against loss or damage by fire, and against all marine risks and disasters, and war and other risks, if the board so specifies, with insurance companies or underwriters, and under forms of policies, and to an amount, approved by the board, which insurance shall, if the board so requires, be made payable to it in the event of partial loss or collision liability; and (b) by protection and indemnity insurance with insurance companies, associations, or underwriters, and under forms of policies and to amount approved by the board.

Mr. WALSH. I move to amend, on page 6, line 5, by inserting the word "an" before the word "amount."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 6, line 5, before the word "amount," insert the word "an."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. We have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I have another amendment. On page 6, line 1, strike out the words "if the board so requires."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 6, line 1, after the word "shall," strike out the words "if the board so requires."

Mr. ALEXANDER. We want to be heard on that amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, we give the board ample discretion in fixing the amount and the kind of insurance which shall be taken out, and it would seem to me that the insurance which is placed should be payable to the Shipping Board. We ought not to direct them to have this insurance placed on these vessels under this plan, where the vessels are being purchased on time payments, and have the insurance payable to somebody else. It would seem to me that in order for the Government to be amply protected the law should state that when they sell these vessels upon a payment plan extending over 15 years, the board must require this insurance to be placed, and that in the event of loss the insurance should be paid to the board or to the Government, and we ought not to leave that board to say in this case that the insurance must be paid to them in one case and in another case you can have it paid to the owner or to the charter party, if you like, or somebody else. I do not quite see why we should vest any such broad discretion as that in the Shipping Board.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The reason assigned by the counsel for the Shipping Board was this: Take a company like the International Merchant Marine, with a large fleet; they purchase a ship and it goes into their fleet. They carry a blanket insurance policy covering their entire fleet, and in that event we give the board the discretion to make the policy payable to the Shipping Board in the event of loss or to see that the company shall take care of their fleet and protect their creditors to the extent of the insurance of their fleet of ships. It is simply to provide against such a condition as that. If a small company or an individual purchases one or two or three ships in building up a fleet, and it is necessary for the security of the Shipping Board to have the policy of insurance payable to the Shipping Board or to the Government, as the case may be, then they may do that.

Mr. WALSH. I think this great international corporation, which I have no doubt will in the future have a great influence and participate to a tremendous extent in the shipping of this country, ought to be placed upon the same footing as the small, private owner. If the board says to it, "We will sell you this ship and give you 10 or 15 years to pay for it, and you have got to keep it insured, and in case of loss the insurance on that ship shall come to the Shipping Board," we ought not to discriminate in favor of large corporations in this way and permit this discretion to rest in the Shipping Board. We ought to have them all placed on the same basis, whether they insure their whole fleet or whether they insure simply one vessel, and I submit that it can do no harm here and now to write into the law that when this board requires insurance to be taken upon ships which have been sold upon the very liberal and easy terms of payment here provided, in case of loss, either total or partial, the insurance shall be paid to the Government, represented by the Shipping Board. That is the purpose of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. EDMONDS) there were—ayes 24, noes 18.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the board may create out of net revenue from operations and sales, and maintain and administer, a separate insurance fund, in which it may insure in whole or in part, against all hazards usual covered by insurance policies, any interest of the United States (1) in any vessel, either constructed or in process of construction, and (2) in any plants or materials heretofore or hereafter acquired by the board. The board shall at all times maintain adequate surplus and reserves as required by the best actuarial practice to secure any such policies, and to secure the reasonable costs, expenses, and charges of maintaining such insurance fund, and shall annually pay into the Treasury of the United States, as miscellaneous receipts, any net profits realized from the operation of such insurance fund.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 6, line 9, after the word "hazard," strike out the word "usual" and insert the word "usually."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. Has not the Shipping Board done just what is authorized in this section in its operations?

Mr. EDMONDS. The Shipping Board has carried a hull insurance fund during the time of the war and up to the present time.

Mr. WALSH. How large a fund have they set aside?

Mr. EDMONDS. It was simply a bookkeeping account. They did not set aside any amount.

Mr. WALSH. How much shows on their books as being available out of the appropriations that Congress has made? How much do their books show as having been set aside as being available for insurance purposes?

Mr. EDMONDS. Probably about $15,000,000. The gentleman will understand that there is no appropriation in regard to the insurance.

Mr. WALSH. I understand.

Mr. EDMONDS. It is taken out of the operating money and is really a bookkeeping account.

Mr. WALSH. How much have they already in losses?

Mr. EDMONDS. From $17,000,000 to $20,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. And still they carry on the books as available for future losses $15,000,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; but some of it is subject to losses that have not been adjudicated, subject to investigation.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state how the board is to maintain this tremendous fund in the future, after its construction program has been completed? Is it to ask for appropriations from Congress for this purpose to keep the fund up?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is provided in section 9 that after July, 1920, the appropriations committee shall set aside a certain amount for operating capital and insurance fund.

Mr. WALSH. I notice in the report that the marine insurance companies in this country are not very numerous and have not carried much of this insurance. Does the gentleman think that if the Shipping Board starts out on this program it will tend to encourage the building up of the marine insurance companies?

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman may notice that it says that the Shipping Board "may" do this.

Mr. WALSH. But they have already done it. If we say that they may do it, we can not expect that they will quit what they have been already doing, because we give them permission to continue.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think under proper management the insurance companies of this country will be able to take care of the entire insurance. Owing to the fact that they are not prepared to do so, I feel that we should have a provision of this kind in the act, so that if it is absolutely necessary to prevent the premiums going to foreign countries, which they have been doing in the past, we can carry this insurance ourselves. I do not know of any reason why we should support foreign insurance companies.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman brought in legislation encouraging or permitting the Shipping Board to insure American shipping, and I do not see how you are going to promote the growth of insurance companies by providing that the Government shall go into the insurance business itself and in the same bill provide that it shall sell the ships that are now under its control.

Mr. EDMONDS. This insurance is to take care of the Government's interest in those ships and not outside ships.

Mr. WALSH. It says "vessels constructed and in the process of construction, or any plant or material hereafter acquired by the board." Certainly that is not limited to insurance of ships owned by the Government.

Mr. EDMONDS. It insures the property of the Shipping Board. The Shipping Board has housing property.

Mr. WALSH. If a person buys a ship to-day and pays for it in full in a year from to-day the insurance that the Government has on it ceases when the payments have been completed.

Mr. EDMONDS. No; when the Shipping Board sells a ship, if they get 25 per cent down the buyer insures that 25 per cent and the Shipping Board insures 75 per cent.

Mr. WALSH. But when the payments are completed the Government insurance ceases and the owner has to look out for his insurance in a private concern.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. Mr. Chairman, for the last three months the subcommittee of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries has been investigating insurance. We have at last aroused the interest of the insurance companies in this situation, and I believe within the next two or three weeks there will be a marked disposition to take care of this insurance which has been going, two-thirds of it, to foreign insurance companies. It has been figured that $71,000,000,000 insurance has been taken in connection with marine affairs during the past year. Out of that two-thirds was taken by foreign countries. Last night the committee had a meeting with three or four prominent insurance men in this country. We are not prepared to say exactly what the situation will be, but while I am opposed to Government ownership, if it is not possible to take care of the insurance in this country I am opposed to its being placed in foreign insurance companies, and if it can be placed in this country I do not want the Shipping Board to do any of it, but have it all done by companies here. If we expect to build up a number of companies doing marine insurance, one of the things so necessary to the movement of ships, we must give them some encouragement in starting out on the program. Marine insurance is a big thing. A man goes in and asks for two or three million dollars of insurance, and no one company wants to take the risk, and so the risk is reinsured, and, as I say, the reinsurance goes to the foreign companies. We have companies to-day with $250,000,000 surplus and capital who are willing and want to take some of this insurance, and I think that they can carry every cent of it.

Not only that, but with this encouragement they are going to go outside and open establishments in foreign countries and do foreign business, so that they can do a world-wide insurance just as English companies do. Banking, ships, insurance are the three things that make ships go. We have to do something to encourage the marine insurance people. We should have this in the bill in order to say to them that we are going to do this ourselves if they can not keep these premiums in this country. They recognize that, and they are going to arrange for some plan by which they will take care of it. I suggest that we leave this in the bill until we find out what they are going to do so as to prevent these policies from going elsewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That all vessels referred to in section 2 which are not sold in pursuance of sections 3 and 4 shall be subject in all respects to the provisions of the shipping act, 1916, in the same manner as vessels acquired by the board under the provisions of such act.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts for the committee: Page 7, line 20, strike out the section and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 7. All vessels not sold shall be managed and operated by the board or chartered or leased by it on such terms as the board shall deem wise for the promotion and maintenance of an efficient merchant marine, provided the operation, charter, or lease of such vessels by the board shall be limited to the time fixed in section 11 of the shipping act, 1916."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was framed by the counsel of the Shipping Board this morning as necessary to make the bill round out fully. I submitted it to several members of the committee, who are agreeable to it, who understand just exactly what it means. They said they thought it was a proper amendment, and therefore I accepted it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If I understand, that limits the chartering or leasing of these vessels for a period not exceeding five years after the termination of the war.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH. And to apply only to such vessels as the board are able to sell either to citizens or aliens.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is it exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the board is further authorized to sell any property transferred to it under section 2.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I will only detain you a moment. I have listened with a great deal of interest to all the arguments on this bill. Everyone who has spoken here says that he is in favor of a merchant marine, and I would just like to know whether it is our inability or whether or not we are absolutely desirous of obtaining that result? The development of our country depends upon agriculture, manufacturing, and commerce. We formerly had a merchant marine that navigated the seven seas. Why not now? Shipping is highly competitive. There is no question but what if we have a merchant marine we must operate it in competition with the shipping of the world or we will not get the foreign trade. That country will get the cargo that will carry the cheapest. Some one said we ought to sell these ships immediately, because just now we can get high prices for them, that after a while they will be cheaper. If they are going to be cheaper, the purchaser knows that just as well as we do. He will hesitate to buy now for the same reason we want to sell. He will wait until he can buy cheaper. But let us dispose of the ships and get them to work. There is no question but what it costs us more to operate our ships than it does any nation on earth. Japanese labor costs 44 cents a day, while we pay $4 a day. The Japanese live largely on rice. Our seamen live on good wholesome food.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not just yet—and the living is not any too good and the wages are not too high for our men. They want the best and are entitled to the best. They say we can not have a merchant marine. Why? One gentleman says because we have no return cargoes. I want to know where we would get enough return cargoes? We ship out of this country now twice as much as we import. If we ship out twice as much as we import, then there will be nothing to bring back half the time. In the fiscal year of 1919, just passed, our exports amounted to $7,233,348,518, while our imports were only $3,095,871,604. There is only one way to do it, and that is to do exactly what every nation does. Every nation on earth outside of this country subsidizes its foreign shipping.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman is in error about every nation subsidizing its freight ships.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Germany is the only one, and they send all their foreign shipping to the seaport without any charge.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the gentleman ought to inform himself on that question before he makes such a bald assertion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The subject is fully covered in a document issued by the Department of Commerce, entitled "Government Aid to Merchant Shipping," on page 76 of which the following appears:

The wide extent of ocean shipping under the German flag is, however, a new development and is to be accounted for by a number of factors, among which are the following:

(1) Expansion of the foreign trade of Germany.
(2) Control of much of the emigrant traffic to the United States.
(3) Ability to produce iron and steel cheaply.
(4) Development of the shipbuilding industry by reason of (a) low cost of iron and steel; (b) free admission of raw materials for ship construction; (c) low railroad freights on materials shipped from interior points in Germany; (d) naval contracts; (e) preference in the construction of vessels for subsidized lines.
(5) Effective coordination of services so as to avoid duplication of routes. German steamship lines are not only permitted but are encouraged to enter into pooling agreements for the maintenance of rates, the division of territory, and the payment of deferred rebates.
(6) Judicious subventions.
(7) Preferential railway rates on goods shipped via specified steamship lines.

On page 25 a statement is made:

The expenditures of Japan for mail, subventions, and subsidies have been very liberal. The fact that the merchant marine of Japan has developed very rapidly since the institution of the subsidiary has been attributed by many to the liberal State aid which it has received.

While under direct aid, on page 51, in reference to Great Britain, it is stated:

No general bounties have been given, as in France, Italy, Austria, and Spain, for all vessels built in domestic yards, or for all vessels operated under the national flag.

It seems to me this is a most auspicious and favorable time to establish an American merchant marine. I am strongly in favor of that. We have the ships, 2,360 built and to be built. The ships of themselves will form a very large fleet, and it would be better to put them into the service than allow them to be tied up at the docks. I am pleased to note that this bill allows them to be sold on long-time and easy terms. I think that will do much as a starter. But to keep them in the service we must meet strong competition. I believe this can be done by granting to owners engaged in foreign trade such terms as will permit them to compete whether it be in wages, insurance, or cost of construction. Another great benefit will be found in the number of seamen required to operate the fleet, who otherwise would be unavailable and unacquainted with the sea should necessity ever arise for operating ocean-going vessels. I am much in favor of the bill, and believe it is a step in the right direction. It opens the door for the establishment of a merchant marine, which is in much favor by the public and will find ready support both in and out of Congress.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] expressed great concern as to our ability to maintain a merchant marine if a protective-tariff law should be enacted. Well, I call attention to the fact that before the Civil War we carried the bulk of the goods of the world, and we carried those goods under high-protective-tariff laws. It was not the protective-tariff system that drove our merchant marine from the seas. We carried those goods because the old clipper ships were the most efficient in the world, and the fact that our merchant marine was driven from the seas was due to a number of causes, one of which has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. It was due to the opening of the West and the development of the resources of this country——

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. In one minute—which absorbed the activities of the Nation, which gave greater opportunities to the young men who lived on the Atlantic seaboard, who in the olden time would have gone into the merchant marine, but who under the new conditions went into other industries. They went into the West because they were afforded greater opportunities, and they could make more money on the land than they could on the sea.

Mr. BLACK. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. In one minute. Another reason was the fact that we stuck to the old clipper ships too long. Great Britain started in experimenting with steam, and we did not believe in this country that steam could be ever developed to the point of efficiency where it would drive the old sailing clipper ships out of business. But we were wrong about it. Then came along the Civil War, and during the Civil War Great Britain took advantage of our inability to develop our merchant marine, and she got ahead of us during the Civil War and has stayed ahead of us ever since. While I do not think we have anything to fear from the protective-tariff policy, under which the industries of this country have developed so that they produce the largest part of the cargoes which must be carried by our merchant marine, I do think there are certain factors that are going to operate against our success in the carrying trade unless we take some corrective action. It has been stated upon the floor of the House that the wages of the merchant marine of the world are practically equal at the present time.

Well, that may be true now, but if it is true it is only true on account of war conditions, and those favorable wage conditions will not continue in the future. We have got to provide against that, especialy on the Pacific coast in competition with the Japanese merchant marine. I think that there will be found our most formidable competition, and if we are going to compete against the Japanese merchant marine in the future, we will have to adopt a subsidy or do something to overcome the wage handicap.

And there is another matter which operates seriously against us at the present time and will continue to operate seriously against us in the future, and that is the fact that American seamen, under the La Follette Act, can leave the ships at any port. If we do not correct that in the future, it is going to be a very serious matter, operating against the success of the American merchant marine. [Applause.] I believe if our merchant marine is going to accomplish the things we hope for it, if we are going to recover a large share of the carrying trade of the world, the share we had in the past and that we want to have in the future, we will have to make from time to time some substantial amendments to the existing seamen's act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 7, line 2, after the figure "2," insert "under such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe, but completion of payment of the purchase price shall be within five years from the date of the contract of sale."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this is a similar provision to that included in the section authorizing the sale of ships.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It is very agreeable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the net proceeds derived by the board prior to July 1, 1920, from any activities authorized by this act or by the shipping act, 1916, save such an amount as the board shall deem necessary to withhold as operating capital, for the purposes of section 7 of this act, or for the insurance fund authorized in section 6, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the board and may be expended by it, within the limits of the amounts heretofore or hereafter authorized, for the construction, requisitioning, or purchasing of vessels. After July 1, 1920, such net proceeds, less such an amount as may be authorized annually by Congress to be withheld as operating capital, or for such insurance fund, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts. The board shall, as rapidly as in its discretion is warranted, withdraw investment of Government funds made during the emergency under the authority conferred by the act or parts of acts repealed by section 1 of this act and cover the net proceeds thereof into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. LINTHICUM and Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is recognized.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am very much impressed by the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] in reference to terminal facilities. It seems to me that one of the great necessities for the success of the merchant marine is terminal facilities and not too much congestion of the shipping in any one port along the seaboard. We all know that the port of New York has been so congested for several years that it has been almost impossible to do business there with any great economy, that the port of Philadelphia has been very much congested, and that the port of Baltimore has had a tremendous increase of shipping and is rapidly becoming like the other ports. New York and Philadelphia have received large appropriations, owing to the war. Baltimore has received some very good appropriations, but we must have a channel of 40 feet and still wider channels. We are the only city along the Atlantic outside of New York having an unobstructed channel of 35 feet up to the piers, but even this is not sufficient, and more money must be expended with us.

What we must certainly do is not alone to say that we want a merchant marine, which I believe all of us favor on some basis. Some favor a subsidy, some Government ownership, and some semi-Government ownership, but all favor a merchant marine. It is highly essential that we should at the same time devolop our port facilites and that there should not be continuous objection every time the river and harbor bill is reported to this House because it appropriates money along the Atlantic seaboard or along the Pacific coast for the development of our channels and waterways. The truth is we are not keeping pace in river and harbor appropriations with the needs of the country. The intracoastal canal system in which the Government has now embarked will, to a larger extent, congest the ports of the Atlantic seaboard from Maine to Florida. We are to have a very large business along the Atlantic coast through this intercoastal system, and that of itself will require more channel space, more piers, and port facilites. In Baltimore we have looked forward to this situation, and are trying to keep ahead of the requirements of trade. On the 23d of October last the press published a report that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. was completing its pier and grain elevator in Baltimore, being built by James Stewart & Co., and having a capacity of 5,000,000 bushels of grain. It can accommodate five ships at one time. The elevator has a receiving capacity of 400 cars in 10 hours and a loading capacity of 1,800,000 bushels in 10 hours. That, with the additional elevators which we have, gives a capacity of 10,000,000 bushels of grain. Baltimore has 18 miles of water front suitable for docking purposes including 6¾ miles in the main inner harbor, 3½ miles on the middle branch within technical city limits, and at least 8 miles more adjacent to the city limits. It has 160 wharves in the main harbor, with 145,700—say 27¾ miles frontage of wharf room. Adding this amount of wharf frontage to the other water front of the Patapsco River and its tributaries gives a total of 120 miles water front, developed and undeveloped. Of this wharfage the city owns 13 piers with a wharf frontage of 26,385 feet—5 miles.

The port facilities, the quick operation of ships, the quick loading and accommodaiton at the various ports are highly essential to the success of any merchant marine which we may establish.

Maryland, as I have said before, embracing within its area so much of that vast expanse of water which constitutes the beautiful Chesapeake Bay, it is but natural she should take a keen interest in our merchant marine, and that she should be vitally affected by everything that relates to it.

The water is the theater of activity of many of our people, and many of those now living can remember the day when the Chesapeake was dotted with its white fleets of clipper ships whose prowess and reputation made the name of Baltimore famous throughout the world. My father, Sweetser Linthicum, who spent seven years of his early life as the captain of his father's vessel, has told me on numerous occasions of the great merchant ships of our city which traversed the globe when he was thus engaged and when our merchant marine was in its glory, and he was sad when relating how our marine had gradually faded away during his life. And Richard Henry Dana, jr., in that splendid work of his, "Two Years Before the Mast," refers to the good ship Ann McKim, of Baltimore, as being one of the fastest and best-sailed merchantmen on the Pacific coast Thus, even while Baltimore was in her infancy, her clipper ships were carrying her goods and making her products known to the people of distant lands.

Little more than 65 years ago American merchant ships, sailed by American masters and manned by American crews, were supreme upon the sea. It was the era of the clipper ship, the highest development in the art of wooden-ship building. The American ship in that day was the most perfect mechanism that sailed the waters. American shipmasters were men of energy, genius, and ability, while the crews they commanded were of a class whose equals were not to be found elsewhere upon the waters of the earth.

It is invigorating to know that after the lapse of so many years during which American ships were seldom seen in the ports of the world, and the American flag was seen seldom on anything except its warships, to-day we have again entered upon a vast shipbuilding program; that America to-day has more ship workers, more shipyards, more shipways, more vessels under construction, and is turning them out more rapidly and in greater number than now issue from all the shipyards of the world. We are the premier shipbuilding nation of the entire world, and this we have attained in one gigantic stride since the beginning of the war.

Up to the outbreak of the World War we had only 15 vessels of 1,000 tons engaged in overseas trade. To-day the American flag floats from 1,280 ocean-going steamships, 1,107 of which have been built by the United States Shipping Board within the last two years. In June, 1914, the total gross tonnage under the American flag, including coastwise shipping and the freight operating on the Great Lakes, was 4,287,000 tons, while in June, 1919, its gross tonnage was 11,983,000, an increase of 278 per cent, and this chiefly in ocean-going vessels. To-day the steam tonnage of America sailing under Old Glory is 24.8 per cent of the steam tonnage of the world. Certainly this is a splendid record, and one of which the public generally should feel most proud.

The stride made by our Government during the war only goes to show what American energy and perseverance can do when called upon in an emergency. It is only fair to say, however, that there should never again be such an emergency. America should be well prepared with ships in which to carry her own trade and to back up her Navy both in time of peace and in time of war. Never should this country again allow itself to get into the position as to the tonnage of the world which we occupied prior to the war. With its great natural resources, its expert and ingenious mechanics, its business men, and its great financial enterprises, America should eventually hold the first place in the commerce of the world. If she can perform the miracles which she did in the war in commerce and in shipbuilding, certainly she can rapidly attain the position of first commercial nation. I am very glad we have made such wonderful progress in shipbuilding during the last few years and feel assured no backward step will be taken from the wonderful progress we have attained.

A moment's reflection will bring home to anyone considering the subject how independent the United States is when building for its own shipping. Thousands of miles of sea separate us from the great shipyards of Europe. It is natural therefore that we should depend on ourselves for our ships and that we should build these ships adapted to our own needs. It is a historical fact that the shipbuilding nations have ever been the shipowning nations, and that nations without shipbuilders are nations without ships and without trades of their own. To neglect to build our own ships is to neglect to own the ships in which our commerce is carried. To neglect to own the ships in which we carry our commerce is to attempt to compete with our rivals for that commerce under conditions most unfair. The successful commercial nations of the past have been those nations who have built their own ships and have carried their commerce in these ships to the nations of the earth. To endeavor to build up a great State from commerce without controlling the vessels of commerce is a proposition as impossible as that to set aside the laws of gravitation.

We adopted the doctrine of freer trade relations with the nations of the earth through the reduction of the old tariff laws, but many do not seem to realize that, notwithstanding how cheaply and successfully we can produce in this country, we can never hope to secure the greatest success in our foreign commercial enterprise if these natural advantages which we enjoy be fettered by a condition in which we are compelled to transport the things we produce to other nations in the ships of nations who are our rivals for the same trade.

The wisdom of the policy of our forefathers in encouraging building and the maintenance of an adequate merchant marine has been demonstrated time and again. We are told that under their farseeing policy of encouragement eligible farms became town sites, land increased in value, and trade and industry everywhere felt the quickening impulse of foreign trade. Every interest in the country was benefited by the policy adopted which gave to our country the business of shipbuilding; of getting ship timber; of building dry docks and repairing vessels; of making spars, blocks, and pumps; of fitting, rigging, and of sailmaking; of making anchors and chains, windlasses and capstans; of building boats and making oars; of equipping and outfitting vessels; of supplying provisions and clothing for crews; and many other incidental trades.

The people of no other nation take more pride in their navy than do the American people, nor have the people of any other nation of the earth more reason to take pride in their navy than have the American people. Yet no navy can be successfully maintained unless there is behind it an adequate merchant marine. The one is essential to the other.

What would be your opinion of the business acumen of a merchant, keenly competing with other merchants for trade, who hired the vehicles of his competitors to deliver his goods? Without hesitation you would say that if this merchant was not wholly ruined by such a policy he would at least never reap the full benefit of his success.

A natural business policy and an individual business policy proceed along identical lines, and what is disastrous to the individual is equally disastrous from a national viewpoint.

Let us not overlook that every transportation system is an artery of commerce, and that every artery of commerce becomes sooner or later a producer of commerce. The representatives of these systems become the logical agents of the goods they handle, for in developing their own business it is necessarily incumbent on them to stimulate that commerce from which they derive their profits.

In conclusion let me say that the American people are to be highly congratulated, and those who have had the building of the ships should be highly pleased that America has again taken her place in the commerce of the world, not alone in vast trade but in hauling her products to the ports of the countries in American-built ships, laden with American goods, and manned by American crews; that they will invade every ocean and sea and every port of commercial size; that Baltimore, one of the largest shipbuilding ports along the seaboard, is again taking its part in this great enterprise, and her ships are becoming as well known as her clipper ships of old.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks the same privilege. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say in answer to the numerous statements made by Members of the House about the different things that should be used to build up the American merchant marine, that the committee will not be out of business after the passage of this act.

The question of ports and facilities is receiving our attention. The question of a number of different lines and the manning of vessels is also receiving our attention, and we expect to have quite a few acts brought in here. This is only the beginning of a movement to keep our ships on the seas. I would not be surprised before we get through if we should have 10 or 12 different pieces of legislation that would be necessary for us to pass in order to keep the shipping moving.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I recognize the fact that the gentleman and his committee are in favor of the extension of these port facilities. I know the gentleman appreciates the importance of that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, what is the meaning of this language on line 17 of page 7, "The board shall, as rapidly as in its discretion is warranted, withdraw investments of Government funds"? What does that mean—"as rapidly as in its discretion is warranted"?

Mr. EDMONDS. It means that it may not be desirable to withdraw too quickly from the investments that have been made in certain shipyards, and therefore we give them the opportunity to use their discretion in withdrawing the Government funds that have been invested in these different industries. We have a Government investment to-day in a number of different industries, furniture factories, trolley roads, and local steamboats.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me that the phraseology there is a little bit too cumbersome, and I do not think it is quite correct English. "The board shall, as rapidly as in its discretion is warranted" I do not think is clear.

Mr. HADLEY. Would not the word "advisable" be better than "warranted"?

Mr. WALSH. Yes. I move to strike out the words "in its discretion is warranted" and substitute "it deems advisable," so that it shall read, "The board shall, as rapidly as it deems advisable, withdraw," and so forth.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 17, strike out the words "in its discretion is warranted" and in lieu thereof insert "it deems advisable."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, in line 5, page 7, a comma should be inserted after the word "act," where it first appears.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 5, after the word "act," where it first occurs, insert a comma.

Mr. WALSH. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the board shall not require payment from the War Department for the charter hire of vessels furnished from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive, for the use of the department, when such vessels are owned by the United States Government.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. How much will this keep in one pocket which under prior law would be transferred to the other?

Mr. EDMONDS. Answering the gentleman, I would like to say that at present it is impossible to state. It will be the 1st of January before the Shipping Board's accounts are in such shape that any man can understand them. Up to the present date, while they have been working very rapidly upon them, they have been unable to get a complete account. It will be somewhere around $45,000,000 or $60,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That all authorization to build, requisition, or exchange houses or buildings or to purchase or requisition land under the act entitled "An act to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire, and to sell or otherwise dispose of improved or unimproved lands, houses, buildings, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1918 is suspended: Provided, however, That expenditures may be made under said act for the completion of such houses or buildings as have heretofore been contracted for and are under construction. If considered advisable, and the board is authorized and directed to dispose of such properties or the interest of the United States in such properties at as early a date as practicable.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts: Page 8, line 11, after the word "the," at the end of the line, insert "repairs of houses and buildings already constructed and the."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That this act may be cited as the shipping act, 1919.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment striking out the word "shipping," on page 8, line 22, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "merchant marine."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 8, line 22, strike out the word "shipping" and insert in lieu thereof the words "merchant marine."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the reason that this is the first bill since the war which has attempted to outline a policy for the future; and while other laws have been known as shipping acts, it would seem that now is a good time to make it known that we have attempted to formulate some policy for the future. I wish that it might be in order to entitle this act the "Greene-Alexander Act," or some such phrase as that, because I know these two distinguished gentlemen, who have given years of service upon this committee, have great familiarity with the problems that they have had to meet in drafting this legislation. Particularly is that true of my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. GREENE, who, as we all know, has made a record in merchant-marine legislation that is a matter of pride not only to his colleagues here in the House but particularly to his associates in the House who come from Massachusetts and New England. [Applause.]

I know that he has been ably seconded by the gentleman from Missouri, Judge ALEXANDER, and, as he has himself said, the other members of the committee have worked arduously upon one of the most important problems that has confronted this Congress, namely, the task of enacting some legislation which will insure the efficiency and continuance of our merchant marine in the future. So I think that at this particular time it would be well to entitle this act "the merchant-marine act," because undoubtedly henceforth all the future legislation will go forward in amending or perfecting this bill which we are now passing as a foundation for the future of our commerce upon the seas, borne in ships which will fly the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, the Republican side of the New York delegation have expressed their approval of this act. I do not think the New York Democratic side have been heard from. So I simply want to add that it is with a great deal of admiration that I have sat here to-day and listened to an American debate, not a Republican or a Democratic debate. [Applause.] It is one of the things that we have to be thankful for that when a really beneficial thing comes up, when the country is in danger, or when the country wants something that is good for the whole people, you can rely upon gentlemen on both sides of this aisle to forward that proposition. [Applause.] That is why it is particularly gratifying to me to be here to-day. I know something about this question. I believe in this bill and approve of it heartily. I think that its provisions in the main are wise. I believe in it because it proposes to give this business back to the people and encourages the people all that the Government can, in a fatherly way, to go on and back up this business and run it; and everybody who has had any experience knows that bright business men in competition with one another can do more to maintain the business interests of the country than any Government bureau. I do not care what it is. Because when you pick men out for governmental positions, they have not the incentive that a man has when he is making dollars and cents for himself. There is some politics in it. Some one gets a Government job because he is a political power or favorite; but when you put this business on its own bottom, and when you send out freight solicitors who are bright and who know what they want, and when they get this business down to its lowest terms in managing it and running it, then you are starting with chances for greater success than you can hope for in anything run by the Government. Although the Government may have to do such things in a great crisis such as that which we have passed through, yet on the whole I am in favor of the Government stepping out and letting American citizens go in and run the business of this country. That is the reason this country is as successful as it is.

I remember when I was a little boy in the country, brought up on a little farm, when we went to the little red schoolhouse we all understood that there were opportunities in this country for every boy and every man who would be diligent, economical, and attentive to his duties. The same thing is true now; and that is the reason that this great American people will hold their own and neither Bolshevism, socialism, nor any other ism will ever down this country. [Applause.] Whenever these things go too far they receive a rebuke. You saw that in Massachusetts on Tuesday, and the great Democratic President of this country was not slow in showing his approval of it. [Applause.] So that it is a fine thing to sit here on a day like this and see men like my friend Mr. GREENE and like my friend Judge ALEXANDER engaged in the performance of a great patriotic duty. I had the pleasure of coming down here 10 or 12 years ago, when Senator CALDER was first in Congress, and we came to advocate something for the interest of New York. I remember my friend Judge GREENE was then chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. I was asked to state the case, and I remember how cordially he invited me to do it.

Now, speaking of port facilities, every American port ought to furnish the best facilities at the lowest price. I remember I was invited by the Republican dock commissioner, Edward O'Brien, who gave me credit for helping him get the job at the time. He brought me before the sinking-fund commissioners to urge the building of the Chelsea piers, those great piers on the North River in New York City, and yet there were some people on the board who opposed it. At that time I made the first talk in that line as to how much commerce did for the country. So now in New York we are somewhat crowded, as the gentleman from Maryland has said, and we are now preparing another harbor in the port of New York. We are providing for a survey, and they have agreed to spend a certain amount of money on dredging [applause] and dock building in Jamaica Bay, a large and splendid harbor at New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, at the end of the bill add a new section 14, as follows:
"This section is added so as to obviate any question of hoodoo."

[Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was being taken,

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division, and upon that I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 240, nays 8, not voting 184, as follows:

Mr. FORDNEY with Mr. ROMJUE.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will make his request for three legislative days I will not object.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Quite a number of Members are not here, and I thought five days should be granted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Three legislative days have been accorded in cases of other important measures.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Very well, I will make it three legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all Members may extend their remarks in the RECORD upon this bill for three legislative days. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman modify his request by requiring that it be their own remarks and on the bill?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT—SALE OF MACHINE TOOLS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith a conference report on the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, and other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the governor of the State of California, transmitting a resolution of the legislature of that State ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution extending the right of suffrage to women.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ACKERMAN, for 30 days, at the request of Mr. BROWNING.

To Mr. GRIFFIN, for five days, to attend a convention at Charleston, S. C., of the Atlantic Deep Waterway Association.

EXECUTION OF THE DRAFT LAW.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the return from France of the great majority of the American Expeditionary Forces, victorious and triumphant, before the 1st of September, 1919, the date set by the German high command for the real world conflict, marks the most astonishing achievement of America in the Great War. That such a marvelous feat could be accomplished so soon and so effectively few of America's friends and none of her enemies believed possible. The enrollment of more than 24,000,000 men, the mobilization, drilling, and hardening of 4,000,000 of these in various training camps and cantonments, and the actual landing 2,800,000 of them on foreign soil was an undertaking to stagger the imagination. Yet this is what was accomplished under the selective-draft law.

Back of every such gigantic achievement stands some man dominant in his personality, tireless in his industry, unshakeable in his determination. Back of this most stupendous achievement of the war stands a man of marvelous resourcefullness, of tremendous organizing ability, in closest sympathy with the democratic spirit of America, and with a knowledge of the civil and military codes of the Nation that is well-nigh omniscient.

Enoch Herbert Crowder, the genius who stood behind the selective draft, is a military lawyer, the Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, with the rank of major general. He belongs to the old school of Army officers, an Indian fighter and a student, with a voice as smooth as velvet and a will as hard as chilled steel.

From the days of his second lieutenancy, in 1881, until he was made Assistant Judge Advocate General, in 1909, Gen. Crowder's unchanging interest has been the law—law for the soldier as set forth in the revised military code, revised by him, which did not receive its final sanction by Congress, after many vexatious delays, until after we were well embarked in the war, in 1917; law for the Philippine Islanders, as set forth in the code of laws framed under his jurisdiction as military governor of the islands; and law for the Cubans while he presided over their political fortunes during the second intervention of the United States. It was during this period that he was called upon to supervise the election of a President of the Cuban Republic and to guide affairs so as to secure the stability of the government thus newly constituted. Doubtless the experience gained in sending out thousands of booths, ballot boxes, and necessary ballots enabled him later to organize and supervise the young men of this our own land for the grim task of war.

Having elected to study law himself while doing detached service as teacher of military tactics in the University of Missouri, he was the more ready to appreciate the fact that in every group of verile young Americans there would be men of exceptional ability who could with profit be set apart for special forms of service in the work of winning the war. This sifting process he provided for in making out the elaborate questionnaires that were signed by the men on enrollment.

While "his unchanging interest has been the law" it has not been his exclusive interest or his ambition, which would have been better satisfied with the opportunity to command one of the numerous divisions he helped to create and for which he unsuccessfully applied in August, 1917, after the execution of the draft was well on its feet.

Perhaps the most striking fact concerning Gen. Crowder is the fine balance of his mind, that enabled him to keep, in the operation of the selective draft, both the civil and the military functions of his great undertaking in such perfect harmony. In the early days of the war, while the debate still went on between the advocates of the volunteer and the conscript methods of raising an army, there were many who feared to see the latter method put to the test, because of the experience of the country during the days of the Civil War. Conscription savored of despotism. Conscription was considered to be "made in Germany." The United States had held for long, long months to the theory of neutrality. We had religiously kept out of war. There were many influential pacifists in the land and more than a few open or secret friends of Germany. If conscription during the Civil War almost led to insurrection, what might not happen when men were to be chosen to go to fight on foreign soil?

It is said that Crowder knew the theory of conscription in all its phases. He had studied its operation from the days of the Greek Republic and the despotism of Cæsar and Napoleon to the Swiss Republic and the scheme to which England was driven after she had suffered the loss of so much of her best blood in the earlier years of the war. He realized how the most brave and adventurous spirits of the Nation were the first to offer themselves—and often to sacrifice themselves for the sake of stirring into action souls that are more sluggish—so that often the material for officers, engineers, and skilled leaders was wasted in the early shock of war, while the baser elements of the community that might have been trained into fairly good soldier stuff either came late into the service or remained as slackers out of the ranks altogether.

Although Gen. Crowder specifically disclaims the honor of being father of the selective draft, Secretary of War Newton D. Baker has publicly declared in Carnegie Hall, New York, "No one knows so well as I to whom we are indebted for the selective-service law in all its bearings, its inception as well as in its complex administration. The man to whom we owe the most in this respect is Crowder."

As the sponsor of the selective-draft law Gen. Crowder was interpreting the American people to themselves. His service was not merely that of a military officer; he was acting as a moral and civil leader as well. He was helping the people of the United States to enroll for the high and holy task of the destruction of autocracy, and then to select for themselves their own chosen representatives to go forth, if need be, for the supreme sacrifice. But it was the people themselves who did it—all the people. The son of the banker took his place in the ranks in the training camp beside the child of the slums; the collegian left his academic studies to stand beside the illiterate immigrant. In an editorial note concerning academic honors bestowed upon Gen. Crowder by various universities—Princeton, Columbia, and others—the Outlook says: "For years he had studied the problem of what self-governing free people like the Americans should do to organize themselves for war. He had worked out the plan. In every detail he had provided for emergencies. He believed that it would be necessary to form a great army of citizens, and he likewise believed that the organization by which that army should be formed should be under citizen control. He counted on the power of the civic spirit of the community to carry through what could never be accomplished by bayonets or machine guns. His conception has been termed conscription. It is more accurate to call it a form of mass volunteering. He created the draft board. He conceived and put through the process of selective service. He was ready with a plan, and when the law was passed he was ready with all the blanks and the detailed plans of organization. It seems as if our service boards sprang up in a night. They did, because the seed was prepared and planted. Gen. Crowder is a military man who understands the civic spirit of free people and who provided a free people with a powerful military instrument admirably suited to their spirit and their needs."

Gen. Crowder is entitled to take credit for that part of the draft to which we attribute our success in classifying the man power of the Nation industrially as well as militarily, and is entitled to full credit for that part of the scheme which contemplated not centralization but supervised decentralization, which said to the American people, "Congress has enacted a sacrificial and burdensome statute, and we turn it over to you for execution." Never before in our history was such implicit faith placed in the American people, and never was a trust more abundantly justified by the response that the people made. This part of the plan was opposed to all our military precedents and ran contrary to the plan of the General Staff framed in January of 1917, in anticipation of a necessity therefor, and which contemplated a highly Federalized execution of the draft. Under such a plan as the General Staff proposed there would, in my judgment, have been failure. When Federal process invades American homes, backed by uniformed agents of Federal authority, themselves backed by Federal bayonets, you may expect the people to first question and then resist that process.

Indeed, it was through this very method of forming draft boards of private citizens, serving without pay, chosen not by the military authorities but by the people through their own representatives, that Gen. Crowder's most helpful service to the country was performed. Under his direction nearly 5,000 draft boards, 158 district boards, and 4,667 local boards, manned by more than 16,000 prominent citizens, devoted their time and energies to the work of selecting the men who were to form our great Army. This patriotic duty was above all else a civil and not a military service, although, of course, its end was to build up the finest army in the world to defeat Prussianism. Into that service, it has been said, "entered the very essence of the draft law, an idea new to the world, the fine fruit of Crowder's 30 years of thought on this subject." This idea, the very antithesis of the Prussianism it was destined to defeat, was rooted in the democratic principle that the men who were of draft age were to come forward willingly to offer themselves to the Government. Thus, from its very inception the American Army made its fight for idealism; and this spirit, injected into the conflict that was fast becoming helpless, contributed more than any other single factor to win the war.

It is all too soon as yet to appraise with any degree of exactitude the part played by each of the people who unitedly beat back the modern Hun and so rendered possible the making of the world safe for democracy and for us. But it is not too soon to approximate to such an appraisal, great and complicated as the finished task must be.

The historian of the future will recognize that in a very emphatic sense no one nation or people saved the situation. It was rather a combination of events, or, if you will, the union of a very few nations, that each in turn and from time to time met the stern requirements of the then crisis and so saved Europe and the world.

It was August the 4th, 1914, and the German was beginning his attack on the forts of Liege. It would be but 12 days before the German mobilization would be complete. In six weeks the Huns would be in Paris and at the throat of France. And then? Russia could be disposed of at their leisure, and the rest of the Continent when it pleased them. Europe would be theirs.

But though this modern horde of barbarians were officered by men who had, as they fancied, thought out and thought through every possible contingency, they had not counted on any real opposition from Belgium. The first fire from those 14 forts of Liege sounded, had they but known it, the knell to their hopes of world empire. For, though with their weapons and their seemingly overwhelming numbers they soon shattered the Belgian armies, nevertheless it took them 16 days in which to do it. And those 16 days were, from their standpoint, priceless—they spelled their eventual defeat. Into the breach had stepped Belgium—little Belgium—and though she was to go down in seeming defeat, she was all unconquered—never conquered in all these ruthless, hellish years of German warfare. And she delayed the German long enough so that he did not march through France fast enough to win to Paris; and so Belgium had, in not counting her own life as dear, saved France and, with France, western civilization and Europe and the world.

However, it was still possible for the Germans to repeat Sedan on a colossal scale; but as to their accomplishment, ask Joffre and France. "Thus far shall thou come and no farther," had at last spoken the French general, though again and yet again he had yielded ground; and backward from the Marne were they driven, those Huns, within all but reach of Paris; and France had saved herself, and in saving herself had saved Europe.

It must not be forgotten, too, that though the world was almost wholly occupied in those early days of the war with events on the western front, there was also an eastern front. In our disgust with present-day Bolshevism in the saddle in Russia, we are quite apt to forget the millions that Russia early threw into the struggle—her successes and her defeats; and we sometimes forget that had it not been for the way in which Russia's early advance into Germany had forced Germany to withdraw many hundreds of thousands of troops from the western front for the time being, events might have happened far differently on the western front. It is no exaggeration, therefore, to say that, though the Government of the Czar was soon to go down in revolution, Russia under that Government had, in her turn, saved Europe.

From the very beginning of the war, too, the merchant marine and the navies of the Central Powers had ,to a very great extent, been driven from the seas or bottled up in home or neutral ports. Sporadically, to be sure, the Germans made their raids on defenseless cities, and they won some bona fide battles on the sea—sporadically, for the seas belonged to the allied powers, thanks to England's Navy, associated with that of France and later with that of America, which I am proud to say contributed her full share of aid to the eventual victory. But back of all was the Mistress of the Seas. And any allied successes on land after the first battle of the Marne were due to the one great preponderating fact of England's Navy; and by and through and because of her navy has the world been freed the necessity of seeing the United Kingdom at the mercy of Teutonic power. And thus it was for England to realize that in saving herself she had saved the civilization of the West.

Then came the supreme effort of the Germans to take the fortress of Verdun. They would not only bleed France white; they would crush her spirit. And after months of fighting, and after France had gradually lost, and Germany had as often won inch by inch, and after it had been agreed by the military powers of the French high command that the yielding of that vantage point would not greatly matter, all the civic pride of France and of the French had risen in everlasting remonstrance to the onsets of the Hun in their immortal "You shall not pass! Teuton, you shall not pass!" And in saving her own morale, again France had saved herself, and so the world!

Nor is it too much to yield the same palm to Italy. Driven from the mountain fastnesses that had been won at such exacting cost, overcome by Teuton propaganda rather than by Teuton arms, she had yielded at the Piave all that the years of war had won; but she had recovered herself at the Tagliamento. And then, when the time was ripe for the final Italian push, by furnishing the necessity for the transference of German and Austrian troops to the Italian front, Italy had, like Russia, saved the western front, and so Italy, too, had saved Europe.

True to the character in which the mouthpiece of militarism had painted her, Germany had entered upon this war that was to dwarf into littleness all former wars. For her the spirit of the gambler—for her it should be world empire or downfall! So, in the spring of 1918, she gathered herself together for the final effort. She would yet win to Paris! She would stake all on one final throw of the dice! With what terrible strides she at first made good her purpose, all the world knows. A dozen miles here, a score of miles there, and the allied world almost aghast! But again, as in every one of the six previous crises, the power of the barbarian was to be thwarted, for so had sworn the Eternal; and in the most appalling crisis of all arrived America. Slow to wrath, and not before she had turned the other cheek, she had at last aroused herself from her apathy, her inertia, her love of ease, and her self-complacency; had at last recognized that the cause of Germany's opponents was the cause of humanity. Late she arrived, but, thank God, not too late; her young and stalwart sons to hearten and to cheer those who were well-nigh spent by the burdens they had borne so long. Nor is it any disparagement of him whose fame as a general is that of the greatest military strategist since Napoleon, to assert that this victory was only possible because of the unstinted way in which our own land sent forth her sons—her thousands, her hundreds of thousands, her millions. By rising at last in her might, America had saved herself, and, in saving herself, she, too, had saved Europe and the world.

In like manner, Mr. Speaker, it is all too soon as yet to apportion in any nice degree the credit due to the leaders of America in the great conflict. Whatever their names, history will enshrine them forevermore. Whether it be the lamented Roosevelt, who more than anyone else aroused us from our national lethargy; or Wood, who inaugurated the first steps of actual preparedness; Gardner, who with such a clean vision of what the immediate future had in store for this country so consistently called the attention of Congress and the country to our woeful state of unpreparedness; or to those who later were forced to admit that this country was in danger and under whose offices was manufactured the finest personnel of any army in all history, whoever they be, I think when impartial history gets written on a plane equal to any of them, perhaps on a plane above them all, will shine the fame of him whom I would honor to-day as the incarnation of America's initiative and genius of organization and administration, who perhaps more than any living man made it possible that America should strike and strike with precision, and strike in overwhelming numbers, strike till the final crisis was past and the final victory won—Enoch Herbert Crowder!

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for a quarter of a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to address the House for a quarter of a minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. McDUFFIE, who is unavoidably absent, was very much interested in the merchant-marine bill which was just passed. I desire to say if he had been present he would have voted for the bill.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] be granted leave to introduce up to 12 o'clock to-night the railroad bill and to file the report on the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] be allowed to file up to 12 o'clock to-night the railroad bill and the report on the same. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to take up that bill on Monday? Is that the program?

Mr. MONDELL. I made the request for the introduction of the bill and the filing of the report, but I am not entirely certain whether or not Mr. ESCH will be ready to make his report on the bill; at any rate, the bill will be introduced to-night and the report will be made if ready; I am not certain with regard to that.

Mr. WINGO. Should that not be ready for Monday, will the gentleman indicate what will be the program?

Mr. MONDELL. I am rather of the opinion that the gentleman from Wisconsin will not be able to make his report to-night, but I covered the report in my request so that in case he is ready the report can be filed. If the report is filed, I hope the railroad bill can be taken up on Monday, and if the report is not filed to-night it will, I assume, be on Monday; and in that event I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] will call up the Victor Berger case on Monday.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. LAZARO. I read in this morning's Post, where a Republican committeeman had said that when the Republicans have the President as well as the House and Senate they would function better, and I just want to know whether the President was opposed to taking up this bill at this time and doing something or not?

Mr. MONDELL. Not so far as I know.

Mr. LAZARO. Is he willing to put this bill through at this time?

Mr. MONDELL. Which bill?

Mr. LAZARO. The railroad bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I am not only willing but I am exceedingly anxious to have it considered and passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Wyoming, in view of the fact that this is a very important bill, would he be willing to let it be printed in the RECORD to-night, so that not only the Members of the House may have it to-morrow, but that the people of the country may have access to it. It is a bill in which I take it every citizen in this land just now is especially interested.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no objection to having the bill printed in the RECORD, as well as being printed in bill form. I do not know whether it will be entirely practicable to do that——

Mr. BLANTON. If printed in bill form, we only get a limited number.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may also be authorized to print the bill in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to express the hope that the gentleman will not call up the bill on Monday, because it is such an important bill that I believe Members of the House ought to have at least a day or two, or at least a day after to-morrow to examine the bill, and some of us would like to go to church to-morrow.

Mr. MONDELL. I am rather inclined to the opinion that the bill will not come up until Tuesday, although I think we could very properly begin general debate on the bill on Monday if it were ready.

Mr. TILSON. Would the gentleman mind specifying that if the bill is printed in the RECORD it should be printed in 8-point type instead of in the very small type that we can not read.

Mr. MONDELL. I shall be glad to suggest that to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I have no intention of objecting, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming in connection with this practice of meeting at 11 o'clock, which I imagine will be continued through the week, if the gentleman anticipates joining with the continuing order to meet at 11 that we remain in session until 6 or 7 o'clock?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, my hope is, Mr. Speaker, that when we begin the consideration of the railroad bill the House will be willing to meet as early as 10 o'clock in the morning. I think that is rather better than remaining in session late, but that will be for the House to determine when the time arrives.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. WALSH. What is this particular urgency, now that the season of daylight saving is over, that the House begins meeting here at 10 o'clock and 11 o'clock at the tag-end of the season? Is there anything particular in view?

Mr. MONDELL. It is in order to justify the vote of the gentlemen who voted against repealing the daylight-saving law. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming that the House meet at 11 o'clock on Monday?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, perhaps it will be proper for me to say that I hope that we may meet early and if necessary sit late next week, and that by the end of the week we may have passed the railroad bill, and that conditions at both ends of the Capitol will then be such that we can secure an agreement for an adjournment. [Applause.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3844. An act for the relief of Della James.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2495. An act transferring the tract of land known as Craney Island from the jurisdiction of the War Department to the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department and transferring the tract of land known as Fishermans Island from the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department to the jurisdiction of the War Department;

S. 2494. An act to transfer the tract of land known as the Lighthouse Reservation at North Point, Md., from the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce to the jurisdiction of the War Department;

S. 681. An act to amend an act approved March 4, 1913, entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes"; and

S. 3159. An act to authorize the State road department of the State of Florida to construct and maintain a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, near Caryville, Fla., approximately 170 feet south of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad bridge.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 241. Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order, until Monday, November 10, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill authorizing the appointment by the President of Maj. William Roberts, United States Army, retired, in the reserve of the United States Public Health Service without prejudice to his present retired status in the United States Army (H. Doc. No. 293); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of the 5th instant submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required for additional teachers and employees in the public schools, District of Columbia, for the fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 294); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. WHALEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10207) providing for service of process in causes removed from a State or other court to a United States court, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 452), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10404) to amend sections 4, 8, and 10 of the act of June 29, 1906, as amended, relating to naturalization, to provide a division of patrol guard in the Bureau of Immigration, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 457), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. REED of New York, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2440) for the relief of the estate of John M. Lea, deceased, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 451), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BABKA, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1790) for the relief of John K. Ashley, jr., reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 453), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BEE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6414) for the relief of Herman W. Schallert, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 454), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEAGALL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3984) for the relief of Thomas Bayton and Bertha M. Hartt, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 455), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 10449) to provide for the erection of an addition to the Federal building in the city of Janesville, Rock County, Wis.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON: A bill (H. R. 10450) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Flandreau Band of Santee Sioux Indians against the United States; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10451) to prohibit the export of print paper from the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HUSTED: A bill (H. R. 10452) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint certain persons in the Regular Army and place them upon the retired list; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ESCH: A bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SIEGEL: Resolution (H. Res. 379) authorizing the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to sit during sessions of Congress and during recesses to examine witnesses, etc.; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. KAHN: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 246) for the relief of Philippine Scouts who enlisted prior to April 2, 1917, and who desire to reenlist in said Philippine Scouts; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GOULD: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 247) directing the Department of State to insist upon the reimbursement by the Mexican Government of those who paid the ransom of William O. Jenkins, United States consular agent at Puebla, Mexico, and to insist upon prosecution and punishment of the same; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 10454) granting an increase of pension to James B. Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COLLIER: A bill (H. R. 10455) authorizing the Court of Claims to adjudicate the claim of Capt. David McD. Shearer for compensation for the adoption and use by the United States Government of his patented inventions; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DARROW: A bill (H. R. 10456) granting an increase of pension to George H. Bowman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DALLINGER: A bill (H. R. 10457) granting a pension to Jessie G. Gilman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas: A bill (H. R. 10458) granting an increase of pension to Thomas R. Beasley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RICKETTS: A bill (H. R. 10459) granting an increase of pension to Phebie Hamilton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 10460) granting a pension to Serelda Pargin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILSON of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 10461) granting an increase of pension to Martha Scott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of Kitchener Post, World War Veterans, Long Beach, Calif., protesting against the visit of De Valera to this country and branding him as a fugitive from British justice; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DARROW: Memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, favoring the Edge bill (S. 2472); to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, petition of Philadelphia Board of Trade, favoring patent legislation as proposed by House bills 5011, 5012, and 6913; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of Hartford Association of Congregational Churches, for protection of Armenia; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

MONDAY, November 10, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for the promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come. We bless Thee that Thou dost hold us, in all our work, to the final and eternal issue. Thou dost ever draw us on by keeping alive within us the hope of life eternal. Thou hast made the peace and prosperity of the world dependent upon their conformity to Thy will and to Thy law. Thou hast taught us that all things work together for good to them that love Thee. Help us this day to fill up the measure of our ministry to men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, November 3, 1919, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 681. An act to amend an act approved March 4, 1913, entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes";

S. 2494. An act to transfer the tract of land known as the Lighthouse Reservation at North Point, Md., from the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce to the jurisdiction of the War Department;

S. 2495. An act transferring the tract of land known as Craney Island from the jurisdiction of the War Department to the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department and transferring the tract of land known as Fishermans Island from the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department to the jurisdiction of the War Department;

S. 3159. An act to authorize the State road department of the State of Florida to construct and maintain a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, near Caryville, Fla., approximately 170 feet south of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad bridge;

H. R. 3844. An act for the relief of Della James; and

H. R. 10208. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala.

THE LETTS.

Mr. LODGE. I present a letter from the New America Club in regard to the Letts, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW AMERICA CLUB,
Boston, Mass., November 1, 1919.

To the honorable Senate of the United States of America:

We, the New America Club, representative of every alien race domiciled in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, send greetings and expression of our loyalty to our adopted country and its institutions.

We humbly express our concern for the welfare of the newly formed Republics of Europe, brought into existence by the provisions of the peace treaty now under consideration by your honorable body, more especially for the Republic of Lettonie, now suffering from the aggressive invasion of German and Russian troops.

We humbly pray that the Senate of the United States of America, representing as it does the majesty and glory of the greatest Republic on earth and the most enlightened of all peoples, shall not ratify a treaty that does not contain provision for the protection of the smaller nations against the aggression of the larger and more powerful nations; and that no league of nations that does not have such protection as one of its binding clauses shall be inserted in any treaty or agreement as between the United States of America and the great powers of Europe.

For the peace and prosperity of all nations and peoples on the face of the earth we do most humbly pray for enlightenment and Christian brotherhood.

Signed by authority of the New America Club by virtue of a resolution unanimously passed at the annual meeting of the club held in Boston, Mass., October 14, 1919.

EDWARD BLOCKEL, President,
LEOPOLD GILLIS, Vice President,
JULES WACHA, Treasurer,
C. VALENTINE KNIGHTLEY, Secretary,
New America Club, Massachusetts.

REPUBLIC OF ARMENIA (S. DOC. NO. 151).

Mr. LODGE. I also present a memorandum in regard to the recognition of the Government of the Republic of Armenia sent me by Mr. Girard, representing the Armenian committee in this country. I ask that it may be printed as a public document—not in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, without objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS FROM SIBERIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I present a resolution of Seattle Post, No. 18, American Legion, urging the withdrawal of American Expeditionary Forces from Siberia. I move that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution of Seattle Post, No. 18, American Legion, on withdrawal of American Expeditionary Forces from Siberia.

Whereas the American Expeditionary Force to Siberia has been in the Siberian theater since August, 1918, and is still being maintained in that theater; and

Whereas the original military mission, as outlined by the President, has been fully accomplished; and

Whereas the officers, men, and civilians returning from that theater report that the present policy or position of the Americans in Siberia is misunderstood and unappreciated by the Russians themselves; and

Whereas the American forces in that theater have been the victims of vicious, lying, but nevertheless effective, propaganda and have been the victims of armed attacks and suffered casualties; and

Whereas the United States of America's only desire has been to aid and assist the native Russians, and such desired result has failed of accomplishment; and

Whereas the continuation of the expedition will mean great hardships to the men engaged and great expense in lives and money to this Nation and will only lead, as it has in the past, to further strained relations with our allies in that theater: Now be it

Resolved by Seattle Post, No. 18, American Legion, That the offices of this body be used to their full power to secure the withdrawal of the American Expeditionary Forces from Siberia and their return to American soil; that the sense of this body be made known to the Secretary of War and to the United States Senate; and that for that purpose a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of War and to our Representatives in the National Capitol urging upon them the desired action.

GUY M. PARMELEE, Commander,
JAS. E. QUIGLEY, Adjutant.

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there have heretofore been presented under this order of business a considerable number of newspaper comments, editorials, and other matter in criticism of the coal miners' strike. I ask to have the Secretary read into the RECORD this morning the text of the statement of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor issued yesterday as a communication to the American people, which deals with that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the communication, and after having read for some time,

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I withdraw the request which I made to have the statement of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor read in this Chamber, because it seems a waste of time to continue the reading. It does not receive the attention of more than 2 or 3 per cent of the Members who are in attendance. The conversation on the floor is so general and audible that it is difficult even for me to hear the reading of the Secretary, and I sit as near to him as any other Senator. Therefore I do not request that the statement of the American Federation of Labor council be further read, although it is the first statement that has been made here, I believe, presenting in any way the side of the miners in this controversy. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD instead. It may possibly reach some readers who will give it heed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——
Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MYERS. In this connection I desire the privilege of making a few remarks to the Senate, but unless the Senator from Wisconsin has yielded the floor I do not want to be recognized now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Nebraska also rose. I do not know whether he desires to ask me a question or to make some statement in connection with my observation.

Mr. NORRIS. I could not hear fully what the Senator said.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before I yield the floor I will ascertain whether the Senator from Nebraska desires to ask me a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has some right in the matter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no disposition to deprive the Chair of any right. I could not if I had.

Mr. NORRIS. It might be well——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators lately have developed a practice of yielding to Senators when the Chair has not asked whether they would yield or not. The Chair asked whether the Senator from Wisconsin would yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I merely want to say that I wish to be recognized in due time when the Senator from Wisconsin is through.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is with the Chair. It is not with me. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I rose for the purpose of objecting to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin that the further reading be dispensed with. The Senator himself, having offered it, has a right to withdraw the request, but I want to renew it. I ask that the Secretary may continue the reading and finish it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If there be any Senators present who desire to hear it, I shall be glad to have the reading continued. I offered it because I thought possibly it might be informing to some of the Senators to have this statement read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was unanimous consent given to the reading, and the Senator from Nebraska objects to the withdrawal of the request for the reading.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I withdraw the request to dispense with the further reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the withdrawal of the request, so that the statement will be read. The Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the statement, which is entire as follows:

STATEMENT OF A. F. L. COUNCIL.

"WASHINGTON, D. C., November 9, 1919.

"The executive council of the American Federation of Labor, called into special session in the city of Washington for the express purpose of considering the coal strike, the conditions which brought on the strike, as well as the court proceedings brought by the Government, submit to our fellow citizens and to our fellow workers the following statement:

"The executive council is of the opinion that the officers of the United Mine Workers of America did everything in their power to avert this great industrial controversy. Of all the great industries in our country, there is none so dangerous to human life as the coal industry. The men who go down under the ground to dig coal, so that the domestic and industrial needs of the Nation may be supplied, are engaged in work more hazardous than any other employment. Due consideration has never been given to the danger surrounding the coal miners. There is no other class of employment where each individual worker is so isolated and in whose districts there is such a lack of opportunity for social intercourse and enjoyment.

HARDSHIPS OF MINERS POINTED OUT.

"The condition of the miner and his family is such that he is practically deprived not only of sunshine and fresh air but to a certain extent he is deprived of the association and companionship of all other human beings outside of his own particular class who are themselves engaged in the dangerous and unhealthy occupation of coal mining. The miners suffer more than any other workers from periods of compulsory unemployment. Authentic statistics show that the miners have less than 200 days of employment during each year. The wages of the miners consequently, having to spread over the entire year, are greatly reduced as a result of the nonemployment existing in that industry.

"The high cost of living has presented itself in perhaps a more serious form in isolated mining camps than in large industrial centers. There is usually not the same opportunity for the miners in the mining camps to make their purchases to such advantage as is presented in other localities. Their isolation prevents this.

"The United Mine Workers, in their convention, held during the month of September in the city of Cleveland, adopted a positive declaration demanding improved conditions of employment for the miners. They further instructed the officers to proceed to obtain by negotiations with the operators the working conditions that the convention unanimously adopted.

REPRESENTED 500,000 ORGANIZED MEN.

"There were almost 2,200 delegates seated in the convention, representing 500,000 organized miners. They further positively and explicitly instructed their officers that unless an agreement was reached on or before the 1st day of November, 1919, the resolution of the convention calling for a strike on November 1, 1919, should be communicated to the membership. There was no alternative except for the officers, who are elected by the membership, to carry out the direct instructions of the membership or resign from their positions as officers, in which event chaos and confusion would result.

"The officers of the mine workers, with their scale committee, entered into conferences and discussions with the operators in the city of Buffalo. They stated at the conference that they had full power to negotiate an agreement; in other words, that they had the power to give and take in the conference. The employers refused to make any offer whatever. Later on the miners answered the call of the Secretary of Labor and further endeavored to reach an agreement, but failed. The officers then proceeded to carry out the instructions of their membership and communicated the results of the failure of negotiations, and by order of the convention the strike automatically took effect November 1, 1919.

ARE STILL WILLING TO NEGOTIATE.

"The machinery which has existed for years and which has been successful in bringing about agreements between the miners and the operators still exists, and they, as representatives of the miners, were and are ready and willing to enter into negotiations without reservation to reach an agreement.

"At this time our Government interjected itself and applied for an injunction.

"A temporary restraining order was granted by a Federal judge which restrains the officials of the miners from in any way advising their membership on the situation, or contributing any of the moneys of the mine workers to the assistance of the men on strike; also restraining them from discussing, writing, or entering into any kind of a conversation with their membership on the strike situation.

RIGHTS OF MINERS INVADED BY UNITED STATES.

"The Government then proceeded to further invade the rights of the miners, not only by restraining the miners, their officers, and members from furthering the purposes for which the men contended, but went to further lengths of demanding from the court an order commanding the officers of the miners' union to recall and withdraw the strike notification, and the court complacently complied and issued the order.

"Never in the history of our country has any such mandatory order been obtained or even applied for by the Government or by any person, company, or corporation.

"Both the restraining order and the injunction, in so far as its prohibitory features are concerned, are predicated upon the Lever Act, a law enacted by Congress for the purpose of preventing speculation and profiteering of the food and fuel supplies of the country. There never was in the minds of the Congress in enacting that law, or in the mind of the President when he signed it, that the Lever Act would be applied to workers in cases of strikes or lockouts. The food controller, Mr. Hoover, specifically so stated.

PROMISED LABOR WOULD BE EXEMPT.

"Members of the committee having the bill in charge have in writing declared that it was not in the minds of the committee, and the then Attorney General, Mr. Gregory, gave assurance, that the Government would not apply that law to the workers' efforts to obtain improved working conditions. Every assurance from the highest authority of our Government was given that the law would not be so applied.

"In the course of President Wilson's address to the Buffalo convention of the American Federation of Labor, November, 1917, among other things he said:

"While we are fighting for freedom we must see among other things that labor is free, and that means a number of interesting things. It means not only that we must do what we have declared our purpose to do, see that the conditions of labor are not rendered more onerous by the war, but also that we shall see to it that the instrumentalities by which the conditions of labor are improved are not blocked or checked. That we must do."

AUTOCRATIC ACTION "STAGGERS HUMAN MIND."

"The autocratic action of our Government in these proceedings is of such a nature that it staggers the human mind. In a free country to conceive of a Government applying for and obtaining a restraining order prohibiting the officials of a labor organization from contributing their own money for the purpose of procuring food for women and children that might be starving is something that when known will shock the sensibilities of man and will cause resentment. Surely the thousands of men who are lying in France under the soil, whose blood was offered for the freedom of the world, never dreamed that so shortly afterwards in their own country 450,000 workers, endeavoring to better their working conditions, would have the Government decide that they were not entitled to the assistance of their fellow men and that their wives and children should starve, by order of the Government.

INJUNCTION WITHOUT WARRANT.

"It is a well-established principle that the inherent purpose of the injunction processes, where there is no other adequate remedy at law, was for the purpose of protecting property and property rights only, thereby exercising the equity power of the courts to prevent immediate and irreparable injury.

"It was never intended, and there is no warrant of the law in all our country, to use the injunction power of equity courts to curtail personal rights or regulate personal relations. It was never intended to take the place of government by law by substituting personal and discretionary government.

"The Lever Act provides its own penalties for violators of its provisions. The injunction issued in this case has for its purpose not a trial by court and a jury but an order of the court predicated upon the assumption that the law might be violated, and by which the defendants may be brought before the court for contempt, and without any trial by jury.

BLOW AT JUSTICE AND FREEDOM.

"We declare that the proceedings in this case are unwarranted, as they are unparalleled in the history of our country, and we declare that it is an injustice which not only the workers but all liberty-loving Americans will repudiate and demand redress. The citizenship of our country can not afford to permit the establishment or maintenance of a principle which strikes at the very foundation of justice and freedom. To restore the confidence in the institutions of our country and the respect due the courts, this injunction should be withdrawn and the records cleansed from so outrageous a proceeding.

"By all the facts in the case the miners' strike is justified. We indorse it. We are convinced of the justice of the miners' cause. We pledge the miners the full support of the American Federation of Labor and appeal to the workers and the citizenship of our country to give like indorsement and aid to the men engaged in this momentous struggle."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, some days ago Mr. Gompers made a statement with regard to a matter which I wish to call to the attention of the Senate. In this statement he said:

In the first instance, it should be known that the demands of the miners, which upon the surface seem so radical and far-reaching, are by no means so. For several years the miners have not had more than a half year's work—their working days averaging from 160 to 180 days a year, intermittent, by days and by weeks—employment and then unemployment. The miners simply ask for a regulation of the working time, so that coal production and employment may be regular rather than intermittent. If the miners were permitted by the operators to work full time, the supply of coal thus mined would soon force down the price of coal on the market, and this the operators are determined not to permit. The miners' case might better be stated by their demanding at least five days of six hours' work per week, which is really more than they are permitted to work at the present time.

This is a very important statement; and I wrote to the Geological Survey for a confirmation of it, because it struck me that if Mr. Gompers's statement were true, then the operators themselves were responsible for the existing strike. I received on November 5, 1919, this letter from George Otis Smith, the Director of the Geological Survey:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, November 5, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR OWEN: I find from Mr. Lesher's tabulation of coal production and mine operation for the weeks beginning November 16, 1918, and ending October 18, 1919, the average per cent of "full-time capacity produced" is 62.1. The maximum was 82.7 per cent, for the week of November 23, 1918, while the minimum was 47.3 per cent, for the week of April 5, 1919.

Translated into the average hours "operated on the basis of full time of 48 hours," the corresponding figure is 29.8 hours as an average, with the maximum of 39.7 hours for the week ending November 23, 1918, and 22.7 hours for the week of April 5, 1919.

Yours, very cordially,

GEO. OTIS SMITH, Director.

Mr. Smith writes another letter on the same date, along the same line, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, November 5, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR OWEN: May I suggest in connection with my formal statement on coal-mine operation transmitted herewith the following comment:

The fact brought out by the survey's weekly production statistics shows to me that the trouble with the bituminous coal industry is that for the year past it has been working on an average 30-hour week. This in turn suggests that we have had too many mines and miners to meet the current coal demands, although last November the demand was sufficient to bring out a production representing nearly a 40-hour week.

On looking over the weekly record I find that in the 12 weeks of February, March, and April the average working time was only a fraction over 24 hours. During this period, therefore, when, as I remember it, the chief trouble was no market demand for coal, the mines were on a half-time basis.

Yours, very cordially,

GEORGE OTIS SMITH, Director.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask to place in the RECORD a table, on page 933, which was sent me with a mimeograph, showing the days of employment and the number of men engaged from 1913 to 1918 and 1919; also a table showing the coal output per man, 1890 to 1917; also showing the hours of the working days in the United States by the coal miners, and labor strikes and hours lost and the cause, in a table on pages 928 and 929, which shows that the loss of time was not due to the miners, but was due to the allegation "no market." The high price fixed on coal, of course, can make "no market." On page 924 are given the factors limiting production of bituminous coal, and I ask that that also may be printed in the RECORD. I do not want to take the time of the Senate, but I think the Senators ought to have the information before them, so that they can pass judgment upon the merits of this controversy to some extent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FACTORS LIMITING PRODUCTION OF BITUMINOUS COAL.

Coal mines are operated a scheduled number of hours a day—8, 9, or 10, unless for some cause the operations are curtailed to a less number of hours. The causes that may be responsible for less than full-time operation are (1) lack of railroad cars on which to load the coal—railroad disability; (2) lack of sufficient men to operate the mines—labor troubles, labor shortage, or strike; (3) an accident or breakdown of machinery that prevents the mining or loading of coal—mine disability; (4) no market for the coal.

Railroad disability or, as it is commonly called, "car shortage," may be due to actual lack of cars on the railroad or to inability of the railroad, because of congestion on its rails or by reason of wrecks or washouts, to serve the mines with empty cars available or to take away the loaded cars.

Lack of men to operate the mine, causing loss of running time, may result from strikes or simply from absenteeism. It is not uncommon for mine laborers to celebrate local holidays, to have picnics, to attend funerals, to observe pay day as a holiday, and otherwise to absent themselves from the mines in number sufficient to prevent operation. The loss of time on such occasions may properly be described as due to labor shortage, for such it is at the time.

A breakdown in the machinery, a fall of roof in a main entry, or a failure in the power or in the ventilating system that prevents the operation of the mine or causes loss of running time of sufficient moment to interfere with the hourly output is described as mine disability. On the other hand, a breakdown on the tipple that for a short period prevents the dumping of coal into the railroad cars may not interfere with the day's loading, for mining underground and loading of mine cars may progress in the meantime and as great a quantity may be produced as if the tipple had not been temporarily disabled.

Lack of business from lack of market may be responsible for the idleness of a mine, and in normal times is the most common cause of nonoperation. If no orders are at hand, the operators of bituminous coal mines have no choice but to close down. Railroad cars represent the only storage capacity available to nearly all soft-coal mines, and the possibilities in this direction are soon exhausted, for the railroads will not permit more than a few "no-bills" to remain on track at the mines, and shipping coal to market centers in the hope of selling it after arrival is often a poor undertaking and unprofitable.

There are exceptional causes, other than those briefly described above, to which nonoperation may be attributed. For instance, certain river mines may be closed because of ice in the river or from lack of barges in which to load coal. This is disability in transportation but not in railroad transportation.

When, early in the summer of 1917, the Committee on Coal Production requested the Geological Survey to prepare a series of weekly reports on the production of bituminous coal, including the factors limiting production, the inquiry was conducted to bring out the relative importance of the causes just described. This information was collected and published in the form of weekly bulletins, beginning with June, 1917, and is used in this report, particularly in some of the diagrams. It is believed that a detailed description of the method of collecting and compiling these data will be valuable, for the purpose and the limitations of these statistics have not always been fully understood.

The information was obtained weekly from the operators, either directly or through the secretaries of the local associations. In fact, the collection of these data from a sufficient number of operators to make the bulletins worth while would not have been possible except for the cooperation of these associations, nearly all of which not only gathered the information from their members but spared neither expense nor effort in getting it also from nonmember operators in their respective districts. The writer desires at this point to express his appreciation of the hearty and helpful assistance of the many local secretaries and officers of the associations and of the operators themselves, whose combined aid made the weekly bulletins possible.

The information was requested and, for the most part, furnished in answer to the following inquiries, a report for each mine showing for the week: (1) Tons produced; (2) hours of mine operation; (3) hours lost, by causes, divided between (a) car shortage, (b) labor shortage, (c) mine disability, (d) no market.

It is important that reports of this character be promptly available and that they be presented on a comparable basis. The inherent difficulties in collecting so large a number of statements each week (more than 6,000 a week at the maximum) made it necessary to avoid depending on having each week reports from exactly the same operations. The results were therefore reduced to percentages of full-time operation, it being assumed each week that the returns received were representative of the fields covered. Thus if reports were obtained from mines representing 80 per cent of the production of a given district, showing 70 per cent full-time operation in a given week, it was assumed that the 20 per cent not reporting also operated 70 per cent of full time.

In order properly to compare the results from week to week and as between districts or railroads by reports of this type, it is essential to convert the data presented in hours to tons before arriving at totals. This necessity may be illustrated by conceiving a district with but two mines, one able to produce 50 tons an hour, or 400 tons a day, and the other 500 tons an hour, or 4,000 tons a day, the two, representing the district, being able to produce 4,400 tons a day with full-time operation. If the small mine works 4 hours out of 8 and produces 200 tons and the large mine works 8 hours and produces 4,000 tons, the total of mine hours worked is 12 out of a possible combined 16, or 75 per cent. But the combined output on that day was 4,200 tons out of a total full-time capacity of 4,400 tons, or 95 per cent. On the contrary, if the smaller mine operated 8 hours and produced 400 tons and the larger mine operated 4 hours and produced 2,000 tons, the two mines again worked 75 per cent of the possible total hours but produced only 2,400 tons, or 55 per cent of the full-time capacity. Only if the two mines operated the same number of hours would the percentage of hours worked and lost of and capacity produced be equal.

The method pursued in thus "weighting" the returns from all mines, large and small, was to calculate for each mine each week the capacity in tons by dividing the tons produced by the hours worked and multiplying by the number of working hours in a week, generally 48. Thus a mine that in a given week produced 4,500 tons in 30 hours was considered capable of producing 4,500 divided by 32 or 150 tons in one hour and 7,200 tons in a week of 48 hours. If of the 18 hours lost that week, 12 hours was lost because of no cars and 6 hours because of mine disability, it was considered that 12 times 150, or 1,800 tons, was lost because of car shortage and 6 times 150, or 900 tons, because of mine disability. Similar calculations were made for each mine each week, and the quantities produced and lost for each cause were added and their percentage to the total capacity determined. District totals in tons were added and percentages for the United States were determined in the same way. The accompanying sample page of such calculations illustrates the method in detail.

It is at once apparent that this method gives a variable capacity from week to week. The hourly rate of production will vary under the influence of many factors, the most potent of which is the number of men at work. A mine equipped underground and on the surface to produce and load 1,000 tons of coal a day may have only sufficient labor to produce 800 tons a day and may, because of local conditions, produce an average of more or less than 800 tons a day over a period of time. What might be termed the potential capacity of that mine would be 1,000 tons; the present capacity would be 800 tons. The potential capacity is a theoretical figure, to determine which it is necessary to consider the thickness of the coal, the number of working places, the average number of tons of coal produced by each miner at each working place, the underground haulage equipment, the tipple capacity, the mine track capacity, the housing capacity for employees, and numerous other engineering data. The determination of potential capacity has been attempted by certain railroads as one of the factors in car rating, but the difficulties are so great and the application of the results so uncertain that the method has been almost generally abandoned.

Instead of the potential or theoretical calculated capacity, dependence is placed on actual performance. The quantity in tons produced per hour over a period of 6, 10, or 30 working days is used as the basis for calculating the daily or weekly car rating. This is exactly the method used by the Geological Survey in the weekly reports of operating conditions.

The inherent disadvantage of the method of calculating capacity on actual performance is that no account is taken of actual lack of mine labor. A mine may operate full time, 8 hours a day, 6 days a week, and still, because it is undermanned, produce only a portion of the possible output. This, as far as concerns bituminous coal, under conditions that have recently existed and will continue in the immediate future, is not a real disadvantage. Until the arrival of the time when operation of the mines with no loss of time except that arising from mine disability can not produce sufficient coal for the national needs it will be necessary regularly and systematically to chronicle the theoretical labor shortage.

The method described has the decided advantage of being based on easily ascertainable facts and not dependent on estimates. The operator reports tons produced and hours operated and lost, facts easily susceptible of checking. The assignment of the hours of operation lost to different causes may be difficult and in fact its correctness has been questioned. Although theoretically possible otherwise, it must be assumed that only one cause may be responsible for the idleness of a single mine at a given time. Two or more causes may, in succession, prevent operation of the same mine in the same day or during the same week, or as between two mines, at the same time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will precede the question by saying that I am one of those who believe that the miners have not received the compensation for their labors which they ought to receive; but does the communication the Senator has just put in the RECORD show reason for the failure to allow the miners to work?

Mr. OWEN. It does.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does it show that one of the reasons is that the railroad companies under the present administration have been unable to furnish the cars with which to transport the coal?

Mr. OWEN. It does, in part.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does it also show the market conditions?

Mr. OWEN. It shows that the coal was not mined or sent out, on the ground, chiefly, that there was "no market," leaving the miners unemployed.

Mr. CUMMINS. The reason I ask these questions is that, while I have no reason to think that is the fault of the miners, I have some reason to think that it is not the fault of the operators.

Mr. OWEN. That may be true; but the truth should be authoritatively ascertained and justice done both parties, as well as the public.

Mr. CUMMINS. And we must go further and discover the reason for the failure to give continuous employment to these men. I think it will be found partly in the shortage of transportation facilities and partly in a disinclination of the people of the country to buy coal at certain seasons of the year.

Mr. OWEN. At certain very high prices.

Mr. CUMMINS. At certain prices.

Mr. OWEN. The prices are put so high that people will not buy until their necessities compel them to buy. The operators seem to put prices up to the highest point the traffic will bear. This is against a wise public policy, if true, and should be subject to public control under some adequate machinery.

Mr. CUMMINS. And these prices were fixed by the administration under Mr. Garfield—prices that were in many instances so absurdly high that I do not wonder that people rebelled against taking the coal.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to call attention to the facts, Mr. President, because we are face to face with a great industrial crisis, and it is the duty of this body to consider these questions and to be informed in regard to them; and if it can help, I should like to see the help promptly afforded.

Mr. CUMMINS. I concur with the Senator from Oklahoma in that suggestion; and every hour needlessly spent in the consideration of the German treaty is an hour that we ought to devote to our domestic affairs.

Mr. OWEN. I most earnestly and deeply agree to what the Senator says. We are fiddling while Rome is burning. I have protested with all the power I have, but under the rule of unlimited debate our days and months are consumed by those who love to talk, and the Senate is powerless under its archaic rules. We must have the right of the "previous question" before the Senate can command its own time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I made no objection to the publication in the RECORD of the statement of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor which has been read; I was willing for that statement to go to the public through the medium of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I will say, in response to the strictures of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] upon the Senate as to its inattention to the reading of the article, that I was one of those who throughout, from start to finish, paid very close attention to the reading. I had not read it.

In connection with the publication in the RECORD of that statement I ask that there be published in the RECORD, without reading and following that statement, an editorial in this morning's Washington Post, entitled "A national blessing," which contains some very wholesome truths and, in my opinion, much of merit. I send it to the Secretary at the desk and ask that it be printed without taking the time of the Senate to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the editorial referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

"A NATIONAL BLESSING.

"Judge Anderson's decision in the coal strike, enjoining the union leaders from conspiring to reduce production and requiring them to vacate the strike order, will prove a lasting blessing to organized labor. It is a blessing in disguise perhaps from the miners' viewpoint at present, but eventually it will prove an advantage to the laboring man in assisting him to secure recognition of his rights.

"Not only does this decision vindicate the supremacy of the law, but it establishes the new economic policy of the paramountcy of the public interest. The report of the Senate committee on the steel strike states this policy with admirable succinctness in these words:

"There is no place in this country for industrial despotism or labor despotism. No one should be permitted to unjustly cause the great body of the public to suffer.

"In enacting the Lever Act Congress provided for the protection of the great body of the people during the period of the war by forbidding conspiracy to lessen the production of those things which were necessary to the successful conduct of the war. That was a means of protection to the American people against the armed forces of the Hun. Is there any reason why the American people should not be vouchsafed equal protection against disease and starvation? If the interests of the people were paramount during the war, are they to be made subservient to the interests of any particular class in time of peace?

"All economic reforms of great benefit to the public come through the process of evolution, but the policy of placing the public interest above all individual interests is coming to be generally recognized and its justice and strength so thoroughly appreciated that it will not be long before it is written into the statutes and accepted as a cardinal principle of our life.

"The Lever Act, enacted as a war measure for the purpose of protecting the Nation against the cupidity and selfishness of individuals, is held by Judge Anderson to be constitutional, and it is invoked by him in all its virility to protect the public against the horrible consequences of a coal famine. After this demonstration of its efficacy, it is inconceivable that the American people ever will consent again to be thrown to the mercy of contending industrial factions. Never more will the public be content to play the rôle of door mat for the scuffling feet of capital and labor engaged in a scrimmage for their individual advantage.

"Union labor gains immeasurably by this decision, even though the short-sighted leaders may for the time feel the pangs of disappointment at being shorn of their great power. If Judge Anderson had dissolved the injunction and unleashed the United Mine Workers to do their will upon the public, what would have been the result? It is possible that the strikers might have decreased the production of coal to a point where the country would have been frozen into granting their demands. But in the process of winning this victory, what of the millions of fellow workers of other crafts and their families, shivering in their homes, idle and hungry by reason of enforced shutting down of industries, sickness and death, threatening them on every hand? That would have been the price exacted from the public for the miners' triumph.

"A few weeks later, however, might have found the tables turned. The railroad employees at this moment are preparing to tie up the transportation system of the country if their demands are refused. Judge Anderson says they are deterred by the Lever Act from doing this, but if they are not held back by the law and if they carry out to the ultimate limits their prearranged plans, the Nation will, in a brief period, be face to face with a complete tie-up of the railroads. That means starvation. Without the railroads in operation food distribution is impossible, and in midwinter the storage supplies would be quickly exhausted. Then the miners' victory would shrink into insignificance, for with their families crying for food that was unobtainable, their increased wages and reduced working hours would avail them nothing. Again the public would suffer, but this time the miners would be among the sufferers.

"But under Judge Anderson's decision the law is recognized as supreme, and the public interest is made paramount to private interests. With these principles firmly established in our national life, reason is substituted for force, the rights of labor, of capital, and of the public are conserved and justice to all is assured. Union labor then becomes a community of interest demanding just and equitable treatment; not an armed threat. And the ultimate consumer, that long-despised individual who pays the taxes, fights the Nation's battles, and guards its honor, at last assumes the position of a factor in the Nation, with rights and privileges immune from invasion by battling factions."

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in that connection, before I take my seat, I desire to say a few words in regard to the statement of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor that was read to the Senate this morning. I believe that the news of to-day fully justifies everything that I have said in this body in the last few weeks about the present attitude and manifest tendencies of the leaders of organized labor in this country. I believe all I have said on that subject is to-day fully justified. I stated a few weeks ago that there were elements of organized labor in this country which had a strangle hold upon the throat of the country and believed in strangling while the strangling was good, and I think that the news published in this morning's newspapers certainly justifies that statement. It is certainly borne out by the events now transpiring as fully as anything can be borne out by events, and quite as much as I expected when I made the statement.

As I say, I listened intently to the statement of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor that was read this morning, but I find in that statement nothing which justifies any class of citizens in this country in violating the law or defying the law or in announcing that they will not abide by the laws of the land or the decisions of the courts.

I think the time has come when there should be a decision of the question of which is paramount and supreme in this country—the law or a particular class of citizens of the country. I think it should be decided whether the Government is supreme or whether a particular class of citizens that constitute a part of the Government is supreme; and I am in favor of having that issue decided now, without any recession and without any compromise. If it were compromised or postponed, it would simply delay the evil day and would, in my opinion, greatly increase the troubles that now beset us. It has been coming a long time, and I think that issue should be decided right now. I am in hearty accord with the attitude of the Government in handling the coal strike, which is pressing sorely upon the people of the country and vitally affecting their needs and wants. I approve the attitude that is taken by the Government, and I hope the Government will continue the firmness of its attitude. I hope the Government will not consent to any compromise and will not recede one iota from the stand it has taken. I believe, in the language of Judge Anderson's decision, that the law is superior "even to labor."

So far as I am concerned, I would rather freeze to death, perish, give up my life between now and the 1st of January, than to see the Government recede from the position it has taken.

I believe the Government should stand firmly in the position it has taken and let this momentous issue be decided now. I think it would be better for all parties concerned. The majesty of the law and the welfare of the whole people should be firmly established, and now is the time to do it.

I believe we are confronting the most serious trouble that has confronted this country since the days of 1861; and I have come to the conclusion that very much of our present trouble arises from the enactment of the Adamson law, three years ago, which I believe was a grave mistake. I think we are now reaping the consequences of the enactment of that measure, and I hope that mistake will not be repeated and made worse. I believe the Government should, to the end of this contention, maintain its firm attitude. I believe it owes it to the people of the country to maintain it. The majesty of the law must be upheld, the rights of the whole people must prevail, if this Government is to survive. I believe Judge Anderson's decision is correct. It has my approval. I believe the Government was right in going into court and obtaining an injunction against the strike of the miners, which the President has said is plainly in violation of law; and I believe Judge Anderson's decision establishes the correctness of the President's declaration. If it is in violation of law, if it is in defiance of law and order and government and the rights of the people, I believe that the Government should maintain absolutely its present position and not yield an inch, no matter what the consequences. The Government must prevail or back down.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I must ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for. This is all out of order.

Mr. MYERS. I would gladly yield to the Senator from Nebraska for a question if I could, but I can not now. I am taken off of the floor by a call for the regular order of morning business. I had hoped to say more on this subject, but can not do so now.

COURTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary on the bill (S. 1229) to amend an act approved August 22, 1914, entitled "An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States," and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. It simply changes the date of holding court in West Virginia from the first Tuesday of September to the first Tuesday of August.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me just to dispose of two matters in the way of morning business? I should like to introduce a bill to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and a resolution to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the order of business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There never is any, lately.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am rapidly coming to that conclusion.

Mr. KELLOGG. I withdraw the request.

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw the bill and resolution for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PENROSE. I present to the Senate a resolution from the State Federation of Pennsylvania Women, favoring the immediate ratification of the treaty of peace, including the covenant of the league of nations, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the State Federation of Pennsylvania Women, embracing in its membership about 400 clubs and organizations, collectively numbering many thousands of the thoughtful organized women of the State, in convention assembled at Scranton, on this 16th day of October, 1919, That they earnestly urge upon the Senate of the United States the immediate ratification of the treaty of peace, including the covenant of the league of nations.

Copy of this resolution to be immediately forwarded to the President of the Senate, with a request that the same be presented in open session of the Senate and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Submitted by

MRS. FRANKLIN P. IAMS,
MRS. HARRY C. CHRISTY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I present a petition signed by about 6,000 citizens of 21 counties in Nebraska, asking for the early ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to have printed in the RECORD in that connection a telegram from Luther Burbank and others in California in favor of the ratification of the treaty, if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SANTA ROSA, CALIF., October 6.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.:

After carefully considering arguments for and against league of nations, we, as representatives of all races, parties, and creeds, unite in urging you to support covenant without change or reservations such as would be calculated to materially modify its present provisions or delay its adoption.

Luther Burbank, Emmet Sewell, Hillibard Comstock, James H. Gray, J. W. Jasse, S. S. Bogle, Wallace L. War, Ben F. Ballard, Louis Pendrotti, Blitz W. Paxton, F. McMartin, John T. Campbell, John F. Kinslow, W. F. Cowan, D. R. Gale, D. P. Anderson, Charles E. Lee, James S. Sweet, Mary E. Doyle, Charles H. Dwinelle, Peter Hansen, E. L. Finley, and 162 other prominent citizens, whose names go forward to-night by mail.

Mr. PHELAN. I also present a memorial on the immigration bill, which is before the Committee on Immigration, and if there be no objection I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Thomas Enright Post, No. 97, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Modesto, Stanislaus County, Calif., representing 1,600 men of this county who offered their lives to their country, in meeting assembled, passed the following resolutions unanimously:

"Whereas there is now an immigration bill before Congress for consideration and passage; and

"Whereas an effort is being made to open the gates to permit immigrants from certain nations to enter without sufficient restriction; and

"Whereas it appears from the records that in Stanislaus County, as well as other counties of the State, there were a large number of aliens who shirked service in the recent war by claiming exemption as aliens, and out of a registration in the United States of 9,659,382 there were 1,251,712 aliens; and

"Whereas the alien reaps the same benefit from the results of this war (or even more so, because he remained at home and took advantage of the high wages and the surplus of work caused by the absence of nearly 4,000,000 wage earners) as did the man who offered his services to his country; and

"Whereas it is the sense of this meeting that citizens of other countries who have come into this country and have made no pretense of becoming citizens, have not only not done their duty, but have shirked and avoided it, and still make no effort to take up the burden of citizenship, but are content to take all benefits without assuming any of the responsibilities; and

"Whereas this organization does not believe in admitting any more immigrants from any of these countries until some effort is made by those now here to do their full duty: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That all immigration be prohibited for a term of four years from this date; and be it further

"Resolved, That no change, whatsoever, be made in the law with reference to oriental immigration, and we urge more drastic legislation for the exclusion of Japanese generally and Japanese 'picture brides' in particular, their admittance into this country under the present circumstances defeating the purposes of the exclusion act; and be it further

"Resolved, That all aliens who are within the United States at the time of the declaration of war who are eligible be required at once to proceed with and complete their applications for citizenship, or return within a reasonable time to the country from whence they came; and be it further

"Resolved, That the compulsory education law be strictly enforced, and that no person within the United States be permitted to attend any school where foreign languages are taught or receive any instruction in foreign languages until such person shall be able to read and write the English language; and be it further

"Resolved, That we do, without reservation, condemn, disapprove of, repudiate, and reject the action of Sidney L. Gulick, secretary of the League for Constructive Immigration Legislation, in regard to oriental immigrants, and we believe that in spite of his long residence and association among these peoples he has failed to familiarize himself with conditions as they actually exist in the country which he claims as his own; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to our Senators and our Representative in Congress; to Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States; and to the Committees on Foreign Relations of the House and Senate, with a request for immediate action."

THOMAS ENRIGHT POST, NO. 97,
VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
C. C. PARKS, Commander.
D. M. MACLEAN, Adjutant.

Mr. LODGE presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from sundry citizens of Springfield, Mass., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Local Branch, Pattern Makers' Union, of Lynn, Mass., remonstrating against the inclusion of the so-called antistrike provision in the pending railroad bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MOSES presented a petition from the New Hampshire Baptist State Convention, held in Manchester, N. H., praying for the establishment of a Department of Education to remove illiteracy and to promote good citizenship and perpetuate the union of liberty, order, and progress in the national life, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Medical Society of Hartford, Conn., praying that the same privileges of retirement and sick leave granted to members of the Medical Reserve Corps be allowed to the officers of the Medical Corps of the Regular Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of the Friends of Irish Freedom and of the Catholic Ladies of Columbus, of Hartford, Conn., and of the Friends of Irish Freedom, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the recognition by the United States of the independence of Ireland, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of Ladies' Auxiliary No. 12, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of New Haven, Conn., and a memorial of sundry citizens of New Haven, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty unless certain reservations are adopted, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce, of Hartford, Conn., praying for the perpetuation of the present finance service of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Fruit & Vegetable Growers' Association, of Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against the assertion by the heads of the unions with miner affiliations that in reducing the hours of labor and curtailing production they had the sympathy and cooperation of the farmers, and that the farmers are in favor of the same, is false and preposterous, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Congregational Church of Avon, of the Fairfield County Association, of the congregations of the Congregational Churches and ministers of Southport, and of the congregation of the Center Congregational Church of Torrington, all in the State of Connecticut, praying that the United States accept the proposed mandatory over Turkey to the end that the American Republic may assume its full share of the burden imposed upon the people of Armenia, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a petition of the school officers' section of the Upper Peninsula Educational Association, of Marquette, Mich., praying for the establishment of a Department of Education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce, of Jackson, Mich., praying for universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. CUMMINS. From the Committee on Interstate Commerce I present a report (No. 304) to accompany Senate bill 3288, which is known as the railroad-control bill. I ask that the report be printed and properly distributed. I notice that the bill itself, although it has been reported, is not in the file of bills on the desks of Senators. At least, I have none in my file, and I assume that it has not been distributed.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who just at this moment is not in his seat, desires leave to file his minority views at some subsequent time, and on his behalf I ask that leave be granted so to file his views.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, leave will be granted. The report presented by the Senator from Iowa will be received and printed.

TRANSMISSION OF MAIL MATTER.

Mr. PHIPPS. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 6951) authorizing the return to the sender or the forwarding of undeliverable second, third, and fourth class mail matter, together with a short report (No. 303) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill, as I do not think it will lead to any discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if the report submitted by him is a unanimous one?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wish to object to the consideration of this bill; but a number of Senators have requested me to object to the consideration of any bill, as they wish to reach the calendar at the earliest possible moment. However, I assume that this bill will lead to no debate, and therefore I do not object to its consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, fourth-class matter of obvious value which is of a perishable nature may be forwarded to the addressee at another post office charged with the amount of the forwarding postage, and when such matter of a perishable nature is undeliverable to the addressee it may be returned to the sender charged with the return postage: Provided, That other undeliverable matter of the second, third, and fourth classes may be forwarded to the addressee or to such other person as the sender may direct, at another post office, charged with the amount of the forwarding postage, or it may be returned to the sender charged with the return postage, when it bears the sender's pledge that the postage for forwarding and return will be paid, such postage to be collected on delivery: Provided further, That when the sender refuses to furnish such postage in accordance with his pledge, the acceptance from him of further matter bearing such pledge may be refused.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONNECTICUT RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 3332) granting the consent of Congress to the board of county commissioners of the county of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, to construct a bridge across the Connecticut River, between Windsor Locks and East Windsor, at Warehouse Point, in said county and State, and I submit a report (No. 301) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. With the distinct understanding, expressly stated, that the bill will lead to no debate, I do not object. Otherwise I shall be obliged to object.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was in line 3 after the word "That," to strike out "the consent of Congress" and insert "authority," so as to made the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted to the board of county commissioners of the county of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Connecticut River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, one end of said bridge to be in the town of Windsor Locks and the other in the town of East Windsor, at the village of Warehouse Point, all in the county of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the board of county commissioners of the county of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, to construct a bridge across the Connecticut River, between Windsor Locks and East Windsor, at Warehouse Point, in said county and State."

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. I also report from the Committee on Commerce favorably and without amendment the bill (H. R. 10208) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala., and I submit a report (No. 302) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. With the understanding that the bill will lead to no debate, I shall not object.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Limestone-Morgan Bridge Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alabama, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a highway and interurban railway bridge and approaches thereto across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, however, That, subject to the provisions of said act, reasonable rates of toll may be charged and received for passage over said bridge, but no charge for the passage of a single passenger on an interurban train shall exceed 25 cents.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Passed the House of Representatives November 6, 1919.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT CLERK.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 218, submitted by Mr. SPENCER on the 23d ultimo, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate resolution 42, agreed to June 6, 1919, authorizing the Committee on Claims of the United States Senate to employ an assistant clerk during the present session of Congress be, and the same hereby is, extended and continued in full force and effect during the remainder of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

COURTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. KELLOGG. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1229) to amend an act approved August 22, 1914, entitled "An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States." I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States be amended and reenacted so that the same shall read as follows:

"SEC. 113. The State of West Virginia is divided into two districts, to be known as the northern and southern districts of West Virginia. The northern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Hancock, Brooke, Ohio, Marshall, Tyler, Pleasants, Wood, Wirt, Ritchie, Doddridge, Wetzel, Monongalia, Marion, Harrison, Lewis, Gilmer, Calhoun, Upshur, Barbour, Taylor, Preston, Tucker, Randolph, Pendleton, Hardy, Grant, Mineral, Hampshire, Morgan, Berkeley, and Jefferson, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for the northern district shall be held at Martinsburg on the first Tuesday of April and the third Tuesday of September; at Clarksburg on the second Tuesday of April and the first Tuesday of October; at Wheeling on the first Tuesday of May and the third Tuesday of October; at Philippi on the fourth Tuesday of May and the second Tuesday of November; at Elkins on the first Tuesday in July and the first Tuesday in December; and at Parkersburg on the second Tuesday of January and the second Tuesday of June: Provided, That a place for holding court at Philippi shall be furnished free of cost to the United States by Barbour County until other provision is made therefor by law: And provided further, That a place for holding court at Elkins shall be furnished free of cost to the United States by Randolph County until other provision is made therefor by law. The southern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Jackson, Roane, Clay, Braxton, Webster, Nicholas, Pocahontas, Greenbrier, Fayette, Boone, Kanawha, Putnam, Mason, Cabell, Wayne, Lincoln, Logan, Mingo, Raleigh, Wyoming, McDowell, Mercer, Summers, and Monroe, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for the southern district shall be held at Charleston on the first Tuesday of June and the third Tuesday of November; at Huntington on the first Tuesday of April and the first Tuesday after the third Monday of September; at Bluefield on the first Tuesday of May and the third Tuesday of October; at Williamson on the first Tuesday of October; at Webster Springs on the third Tuesday of August; and at Lewisburg on the second Tuesday of July: Provided, That a place for holding court at Webster Springs shall be furnished free of cost to the United States: And provided further, That a place for holding court at Williamson shall be furnished free of cost to the United States by Mingo County until other provision is made therefor by law."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 3406) for the purchase of buildings and grounds for the embassy of the United States at Brussels, Belgium; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 3407) granting an increase of pension to Louisa Baumgard; and

A bill (S. 3408) granting a pension to Jesse Murphy (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3409) granting a pension to David R. Locke; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WOLCOTT:

A bill (S. 3410) granting a pension to Jesse K. Baylis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MOSES:

A bill (S. 3411) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3412) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) to continue the control of imports of dyes and coal-tar products; to the Committee on Finance.

EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT CLERK.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 225), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the resolution of the Senate No. 49, agreed to on June 6, 1919, authorizing the Committee on Foreign Relations to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, during the present session of Congress, be, and the same hereby is, extended and continued in full force and effect during the remainder of the present Congress.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 226), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation be, and they are hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

1. How many ships or contracts for ships under construction in American shipyards for Norwegian citizens were requisitioned by the United States after April 6, 1917?

2. Give the amount of the claims growing out of such requisitioning, and, if they have not yet been adjusted, state what steps have been taken to adjust them and why they have not been sooner adjusted and settled.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE TO DIPLOMATIC OFFICERS.

Mr. MOSES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 227), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to inform the Senate of the names of all diplomatic officers granted leaves of absence since June 30, 1914, the extent of such leaves of absence, and the amount of pay received during such period; also the names of such diplomatic officers as have been during the same period recalled from their respective posts for special duty in the Department of State or elsewhere, the period of such special duty, and the amount of pay received during such period.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I ask that the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. McLEAN, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. OWEN conferees on the part of the Senate.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have received a communication from a prominent attorney of Detroit, Mich., who is interested in the railroad situation and who has presented his views in the form of a short bill. He is in favor of Government ownership. He gives a short analysis of the bill; and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., November 7, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your kind letter of the 5th is just received. Inclosed find draft of the bill which I would be much pleased to have you introduce. I take the liberty of making the following brief comments on the nine sections of the bill:

Section 1: The Government operates without any entangling alliances and Congress makes any changes experience dictates.

Section 2: The Interstate Commerce Commission's appraisal would doubtless be satisfactory to the people.

Section 3: The President will act promptly both in offering and, when necessary, condemning.

Section 5: The director general and commission would be proper parties to decide as to improvements.

Section 6: Congress alone should authorize the buying and building of additional railroads.

Section 7: One hundred year 4 per cent Government bonds would sell at par.

The entire cost, including purchase price, improvements, and additions, should be paid by issuing Government bonds and guaranteeing present railroad bonds.

Railroad values are now largely represented by railroad bonds maturing at various times, some over 300 years hence.

Section 8: Fifty million dollars annual sinking fund would pay the principal in about 150 years.

Congress might in the future increase the sinking fund, but should not add to the burdens of the present generation.

And Congress might conclude in this particular case that "a national debt is a national blessing" and carry the debt permanently, as the bonds would give a safe investment with a reasonable return, while the Government is only a guarantor, amply secured by property in its possession.

Section 9: It is not desirable to have our railroads operated by either capital or labor.

A railroad, like a post office, is a public utility and should be owned and operated by and for the whole people; the Government should have no partner in either.

But labor would be interested in wages, conditions of service, and safety, and with nine men devoting all their time to studying those problems it is fair to assume that what is best would be done.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. WM. MOORE.

A bill to authorize and require the Government of the United States of America to purchase, own, and operate the railroads of the country, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Government of the United States of America (hereinafter called the Government) shall continue to operate the railroads now in its possession.

SEC. 2. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall find and determine the value of each railroad company's property used for railroad purposes, and now in the possession of the Government, and the amount of the incumbrances thereon, and shall report each finding as soon as made to the President of the United States of America (hereinafter called the President), all of which shall be done as soon as practicable.

SEC. 3. That the President shall, immediately after receiving each finding, offer for the Government to purchase the property so appraised and pay therefor the value so found, less the encumbrances, and guarantee payment of said encumbrances: Provided, That if the finding shows that the encumbrances exceed the value, the President shall offer to buy said property at its value, free of all encumbrances. The amount of any finding, offer, or guaranty shall not be shown in any condemnation proceedings.

SEC. 4. That the President may also at any time institute condemnation proceedings to acquire in the name of and for the Government any of said railroad property, free of or subject to the encumbrances thereon, and shall do so if at the expiration of one year after making an offer for any such property the Government has not acquired title thereto. The President may settle any condemnation proceedings, provided the Government acquires title to the property sought.

SEC. 5. That the Director General may, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, build, change, or remove tracks, depots, and terminals, add rolling stock, motive power, and betterments, and make any other improvements necessary or desirable to unify the Government railroad system and give a proper and efficient public service.

SEC. 6. That additional railroads and terminals shall be bought or built and added to said Government railroad system when authorized by Congress.

SEC. 7. That to raise the money for all the foregoing purposes the President shall from time to time, as necessary, cause bonds of the Government, due 100 years after date, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, to be issued and sold, which bonds shall be known and designated as Government railroad bonds, and shall be kept and reported separately from all other Government liabilities, and shall be exempt from all taxation, except as Congress may provide.

SEC. 8. That the charges for service on said railroads shall be sufficient to pay operating expenses, maintenance, and fixed charges, together with a sinking fund of $50,000,000 per annum, to ultimately pay for said railroad properties and save the Government harmless.

SEC. 9. That there shall be a board of nine directors, three of whom shall be selected by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three by the appointed railroad officers, and three by the railroad employees, each to serve during the pleasure of the selector, and each of whom shall be paid out of the railroad-operation fund $——— per month and necessary traveling expenses, and whose duty it shall be to investigate all questions of wages, conditions of service, safety, and other similar matters in which the officers, the employees, the Government, or the public are interested; and whenever and as often as a majority of said board shall conclude that any change is necessary or desirable they shall file in writing with the Interstate Commerce Commission a petition therefor and the reasons upon which it is based, signed by all the directors: Provided, That if any dissent they shall at the same time file in writing their objections. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall make a public announcement of the filing of said petition, reasons, and objections, and shall give personal notice thereof to the Director General of Railroads, and any American citizen may be heard thereon; but the commission shall proceed promptly to investigate the subject matter of said petition, and for that purpose may take testimony, and may deny said petition or may grant it in whole or in part.

BUILDING OF HOMES.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted by the National Federation of Construction Industries, dealing with the housing shortage in the United States. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution of the National Federation of Construction Industries relative to Senate bill 2094.

Whereas the operation of the revenue and banking laws of the United States has caused a steady withdrawal of capital available for loans upon real estate and has thus seriously interfered with the progress of building construction and national development; and

Whereas it is highly important not only to the construction industry, but to the welfare of the Nation at large, that the erection of homes and other needed buildings shall be speedily resumed; and

Whereas loans upon real estate should be at least as attractive as other forms of investment if the erection of homes and other needed buildings is to continue: It is therefore

Resolved by the directors of the National Federation of Construction Industries, That they heartily indorse the purpose of and earnestly recommend the passage of Senate bill 2094, introduced by Senator WILLIAM M. CALDER, of New York, entitled "A bill to encourage the building of homes by providing for exemption from taxation of the income from mortgages on real estate," modified as Congress in its wisdom may deem necessary, because the passage of this bill will tend to restore the balance in attractiveness to investors between loans upon real estate and other forms of investment, which balance has been destroyed through the operation of the existing laws, and because such restoration will encourage the construction of homes and other buildings now requisite to the happiness and prosperity of the people of the United States.

Resolved further, That the executive secretary be requested to communicate to Senator CALDER, Representative NOLAN, and Representative MCLAUGHLIN the appreciation of the directors of their interest in this important matter, and that a copy of these resolutions be laid before them.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate and to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House.

ERNEST T. TRIGG,
President.

JOHN C. FRAYES,
Executive Secretary.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the American Agricultural Association requested Mr. Fred A. Dolph, of this city, who is a lawyer and an accountant of standing, to prepare an estimate of the annual budget of the league of nations in operation. Mr. Dolph has complied with that; and at the request of the American Agricultural Association I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator in that connection what was the estimated amount?

Mr. SPENCER. As I remember, something over $1,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, that seems a rather reasonable sum to bring on the millennium.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN AUDIT OF THE PROBABLE ANNUAL EXPENSE OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

It has been suggested many times that an audit of the probable annual expense of the operation of the league of nations would be at least interesting, in view of the fact that the United States, having the largest amount of taxable wealth of any other nation, will be called upon to pay the bulk, or at least a very large percentage, of such annual expense.

I have undertaken to prepare such an audit. The probable number of employees and the probable salaries are taken from a study of what such work would cost in the United States, directed by sensible and efficient business men. There are those who believe that the work will not be so directed, and such persons will no doubt add from 100 per cent to 200 per cent to my estimates to cover the added expense of ordinary inefficiency and red tape in such matters.

I concede that I have no data or information as to the cost of commissions to return with proper pomp and ceremonial to His Brittanic Majesty the skull of the Sultan of Mkwawa, nor to return to His Majesty the King of the Hejaz the Koran of the Caliph of Othman, nor the return of the leaves of the triptych of the mystic lamb. No doubt, in actual expense, these items will be considerable, but, having no information or data, I have ignored them.

I have, however, with some patience and industry, listed the 170 tribunals and commissions that are actually named and created by the league of nations and that are put under the direction of the league of nations by the joint treaty of peace with Germany, and have made what I consider a fair estimate in each case of the employees needed to function those tribunals and commissions and attach appropriate schedules giving the detail data, upon which I base the following general estimate.

Salaries and pay roll:
First class, 6,505 persons, at $10,000	$65,050,000
Second class, 12,352 persons, at $5,000	61,760,000
Third class, 166,310 persons, at $2,000	332,620,000
Traveling expenses:
One-third of these employees will be traveling as investigators and to attend meetings at an average expense of $3,000 each	185,167,000
Office rent, heat, and light:
Each employee is allotted the usual number of feet of office space, and this is usually computed as costing $170 per annum per person	31,478,390
Wear and tear, furniture and office equipment:
This is usually figured at $100 per person per annum	18,516,700
Miscellaneous:
Printing, exclusive of labor, plants, furniture, office equipment, attendance witnesses at hearings, etc.	1500,000,000
Total	1,194,591,000

The fact is emphasized that this audit does not include the cost of military occupation, nor does it include the cost of maintaining any of the commissions or tribunals that may be established by the treaty with Austria, Poland, or with France, nor any treaty that has not yet been submitted to the United States Senate for ratification.

Some of the tribunals and commissions I have audited are made a charge against Germany, but the treaty states that Germany is a bankrupt nation, hence the reparation committee, which is in fact a receivership, so that any charge against Germany that is going to reduce her ability to pay is going to reduce the final dividend, which, in any event, will be less than par.

Respectfully submitted.

FRED A. DOLPH.

NO. 59. REPARATION COMMISSION.

Parts 8 and 9 and throughout treaty:

Organization consists of delegate and one assistant delegate from United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. Assessors from each nation. Construes its own powers. Bound by no rules of law or evidence. Appoints its own subcommissions, agents, attorneys, and employees and fixes their salaries. Its deliberations secret. Has arbitrary power to fix money indemnity, time of payment, and to apportion same. Supervises all taxes, resources, and economic operations in Germany. Adjusts claims of persons and property of civilians growing out of war. Restores devastated territory. Replaces ton for ton destroyed shipping. Turn over present ships and builds new and obtains return of ships sold by Germany to neutrals. Provide for certified inspection of live stock to be immediately turned over to France and Belgium—40,700 horses, 184,000 cows, 30,300 sheep, 10,000 goats, 15,000 hogs. For delivery to France annually 7,000,000 tons coal plus difference in coal tonnage between production before war and in 10-year period since in Nord and Pas de Calais; to Belgium 8,000,000 tons; to Italy 7,000,000 tons, one-half to be shipped by land; to Luxemburg an amount equal to prewar production. Adjusts rates of freight and barging and for sea delivery. To France 35,000 tons benzol, 50,000 tons tar, 30,000 tons sulphate ammonia. Accepts dye and chemicals in exchange for reparation. Adjust cost of army of occupation.

The multitudinous duties of this commission amount to a supergovernment for Germany, plus the adjustment of all of her financial and economical affairs; or at least to a receivership for a bankrupt nation.

It must establish its seat of government at Paris, and it will require an army of employees equal to or greater than those of any existing government.

WILLIAM O. JENKINS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times on the case of Mr. Jenkins, the consular agent of the United States who was abducted in Mexico.

The press last week published what purported to be an opinion of the State Department, which I can not verify, stating that the fate of Mr. Jenkins and the recovery of the ransom which was paid by his friends were not engaging the attention of the State Department. I learn, however, that the First Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Phillips, is about to file a memorandum on the subject; but the intimation was that the United States had no interest in the welfare of its citizens in a foreign country, and the case is aggravated by the fact that Mr. Jenkins, who is a resident of the State of California, was a consular agent. There is no question, I think, but that this Government should afford adequate protection to citizens in this case and in all other similar cases, whether the victim is an official or not. No American would be safe against bandits in Mexico if any other doctrine prevailed.

The case is so tersely put by the New York Times that I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"THE CASE OF MR. JENKINS.

"Some rather surprising statements, with what is called official sanction, come from Washington in the matter of the kidnaping and ransom of William O. Jenkins, the American consular agent at Puebla. It might be well before considering them to quote Oppenheim, an accepted authority upon international law, as regards the status of consular agents and the protection they should receive from the Government of the foreign State. 'Agents consular,' he says, 'are agents with consular character, appointed subject to the approbation of the home Government, by a consul general or consul for the exercise of certain parts of the consular functions in certain towns or other places of the consular district.' Concerning 'nonprofessional consuls'—that is to say, consular agents—such as Jenkins was at Puebla when he was seized and carried away by bandits, Oppenheim declares that the admitting State 'recognizes their official position toward itself, which demands at least a special protection of their persons and residences.' Furthermore, this eminent authority says that 'consuls of all kinds have the right to put up the arms of the appointing State over the door of the consular building and to hoist the national flag.' In the light of these principles the following statement of the attitude of the United States Government by 'an official of the State Department' should be read:

"The fact that Jenkins was an official of the United States Government has no bearing on the matter. Americans in Mexico can expect no more and no different protection than is afforded to Mexicans under the Mexican law.

"The State Department advised the Mexican Government on October 25 that the United States expected that measures would be taken to obtain the release of Jenkins, even if it should become necessary to pay the ransom demanded. That was sound doctrine. It does not appear that the Mexican Government accomplished anything, although it professed concern for the safety of the American consular agent. Friends of Jenkins extricated him from the clutch of the bandits by providing part of the ransom money in cash and giving written promises to pay the remainder. During his confinement by the kidnapers Jenkins suffered so much from exposure that upon his release it was necessary to give him medical treatment in a hospital. For a time he seems to have been a very sick man. A newspaper of the city of Mexico, the Excelsior, has investigated the affair and confirms the original story that five bandits or 'rebels' overpowered the American in his factory at Puebla, compelled him to open his safe, which they rifled, and carried him off into the mountains to hold him until the ransom was paid. Jenkins, says this Mexican newspaper, holds the receipt of one Cordoba, the leader of the band, for the amount of the ransom, 300,000 pesos.

"No evidence has been produced that the consular agent was an accomplice in his own abduction, nor does there seem to be any ground for such a suspicion. Outrages upon Americans in Mexico are so frequent, and in most cases so well authenticated, that it is difficult to believe that the State Department, after making a vigorous demand upon the Mexican Government to obtain the release of Consular Agent Jenkins, really means to take the stand that he was entitled to no more protection than a Mexican citizen, and that there is no evidence that the Mexican authorities were negligent in the performance of their duty. If Jenkins was kidnaped by five bandits or 'rebels' in the populous city of Puebla, there is a prima facie case of neglect against the Mexican Government, because it has failed, or shown itself impotent, to protect American citizens in many localities. The case for an indemnity is clear enough for anyone. The United States Government should always be ready to insist upon the protection of its consular agents, and the position that they are entitled to no more protection than Mexican citizens in a part of the country where banditry is common can not be countenanced. It is untenable and intolerable."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed, in open executive session, to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer at this time a number of reservations, which it is my intention to propose. I ask to have them printed in the RECORD, printed, and lie upon the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE are as follows:

Reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE, to be made a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

1. That nothing contained in article 2 of the league covenant or any other provision thereof, shall be construed to deny to the people of Ireland, India, Egypt, Korea, or to any other people living under a government which, as to such people, does not derive its powers from the consent of the governed, the right of revolution or the right to alter or abolish such government and to institute a new government, laying its foundations in such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

2. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league at the end of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty unless within that time each member of the league shall abolish and discontinue the policy of maintaining its army or navy in time of peace by conscription.

3. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league at the end of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty unless within that time each member of the league shall have agreed that in no case will it resort to war except to suppress an insurrection or repel an actual invasion of its territory until an advisory vote of its people has first been taken on the question of peace or war.

4. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league of nations at the end of any year during a period of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, unless during each and every year of the five-year period every member of the league now expending in excess of $50,000,000 for the maintenance of its military forces or in excess of a like sum for the maintenance of its naval establishment shall fail to reduce such expenditures by a sum equal to one-fifth of the amount by which the total annual expenditure for the maintenance of military forces or naval establishment, respectively, exceeds the sum of $50,000,000 for either, to the end that by the close of the period of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty no member of the league of nations shall expend for the maintenance of its military forces or its naval establishment, respectively, an amount in excess of $50,000,000 per annum; and the United States gives notice that it will withdraw from the league of nations at the end of any year thereafter whenever any member expends for the maintenance of its military forces or its naval establishment, respectively, an amount in excess of $50,000,000 per annum.

5. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league of nations whenever any member or members of the league of nations shall attempt to acquire the whole or any part of the territory of any member or of any nation not a member of the league of nations against the will and without the full and free consent of the people of such member or of such nation not a member of the league of nations.

6. The United States hereby gives notice that it will withdraw from the league of nations whenever any member, exercising a mandate or a protectorate over any country, or claiming and exercising a sphere of influence in or over any country, shall without the free and full consent of the people of such country appropriate the natural resources thereof, or shall, directly or indirectly, aid any individual or corporation alien to such country to acquire any right or title to or any concession in its natural resources, or right or title to its property, real or personal, or shall fail or neglect, within such authority or influence as it may properly exercise, to preserve in trust for the people of such country all right and title to and in its natural resources and real and personal property, or shall fail to exercise such mandate, protectorate, or sphere of influence over such country for the sole benefit of the people thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reservation pending is reservation No. 3 of the reservations proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the bill-size print, line 4, the following reservation:

3. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to offer as a substitute for the third reservation, just read, the second reservation heretofore offered by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], found on page 15 of Senate Document 150, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Reading from page 15 of star print of Document 150, line 7, as a substitute for the proposed reservation just read, the following:

2. That the suggestions of the council of the league of nations as to the means of carrying the obligations of article 10 into effect are only advisory, and that any undertaking under the provisions of article 10, the execution of which may require the use of American military or naval forces or economic measure, can under the Constitution be carried out only by the action of the Congress, and that the failure of the Congress to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league or to provide such military or naval forces or economic measures shall not constitute a violation of the treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to have the attention of the Senate, with a view to exposing as clearly as I can the situation that will arise if this reservation is adopted.

Article 10 obligates each member of the league to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and political independence of every other member of the league. The reservation before us releases the United States from any obligation imposed by the article in question, reserving to Congress in each particular case the determination of the question as to whether it shall or shall not recognize or discharge any obligation.

The reservation takes away whatever reciprocity there is in the obligation. It remains binding upon every other member of the league in its original form. The United States is by the reservation practically released from the obligation, because even now Congress may in each particular instance, as the occasion arises, determine whether it will or will not join with any nation which is attacked by another nation.

But, Mr. President, the point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate is that we still accept and receive the guaranty and protection accorded by the article, and we declare that we will not extend similar protection to any member of the league.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, that is perfectly simple. Every other country can do the same thing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, every other country can do the same thing. That is not the proposition at all.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will bear with me, I will try to make my views clear. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Just for a word. Does the Senator from Montana think that the American people look to any other nation in the world or any combination of nations to protect the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No, sir; I do not; and, accordingly, I think it is demeaning upon the part of the Congress of the United States to say to other nations, "We are perfectly willing to accept your obligation to protect us, but we decline to reciprocate and protect you."

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator misunderstands me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I simply answer the Senator, that this reservation, I am perfectly certain, as the Senator from Pennsylvania must concede, does not speak the desires of the people of the United States. If we are to get out of the league, so far as article 10 is concerned, the people of the United States do not want any other country to bind itself to protect us.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, one word. I do not think the Senator fully understood me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think so.

Mr. PENROSE. I understood the Senator to state that it was unfair for the United States to permit other nations to pledge themselves to protect us, while we declined to be considered under the obligation of any such pledge. I wanted to bring out that point, and to ask the Senator whether he thought the people of the United States cared one way or the other about the protection of any nation abroad, or all the nations abroad.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly not. The United States is amply able to protect itself, and I trust it always will be. Therefore, why should we enter into a treaty under which other nations are bound to come to our help? But, furthermore——

Mr. PENROSE. That is their business.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me answer the Senator further. Mr. President, we do more than that. If Jugo-Slavia should be attacked in the future by Austria, we decline, under this reservation, to go to the aid of Jugo-Slavia.

Mr. PENROSE. And we ought to decline.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But if in any way the United States shall be attacked, by this treaty which we enter into with Jugo-Slavia we invite them to come to our aid.

Now, let me say another word. The Senator says we do not. Mr. President, a fundamental rule of the law of contracts is that when a proposition to enter into a contract is made and it is accepted with any reservation, that amounts to a proposal by the other party. We are actually making a proposal to Jugo-Slavia by this reservation to enter into a treaty with us by the terms of which that feeble nation shall be bound to come to our aid while we refuse to go to hers.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it is a matter of supreme indifference to the American people whether or not these little mushroom nations enter into a treaty to protect us.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite true.

Mr. PENROSE. That is their business.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite true, Mr. President.

Mr. PENROSE. It is one of the ridiculous phases of a very questionable transaction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But, Mr. President, it is a matter not only of the interest of the United States but it is a matter of the honor of the United States.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is not consistent with the honor of the United States to make a proposal to other countries of the world that they shall remain bound to come to our aid, while we refuse to go to theirs.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a query?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does not the Senator think that the more appropriate, the more just, mode of dealing with this subject, if it is to be dealt with at all, would be to strike out article 10 entirely?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly that would be the thing to do; and, as I shall show a little later, this reservation is practically striking out article 10, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am always interested in what the Senator from Montana says, but I do not read that reservation as the Senator does. As I understand it, the reservation provides that in case we are called upon by the use of force to maintain the new boundaries that have been made as a result of the war, that question must first be submitted to the Congress and Congress must pass upon it. Does the Senator believe that we ought to enter into a hard and fast contract which should be carried out in every particular case—in every case, in fact—without regard to the condition of our own country, or the will of our Congress, at that time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am going to canvass that feature of the matter a little later, and if the Senator will bear with me I will state to him my views about it. They have been stated upon the floor before. I am going to call attention to the effect of it presently. What I want to invite the attention of the Senate to now is the position in which this places the Government of the United States, of extending an invitation to the little, weak, feeble nations of the earth to come to our assistance when we are attacked, and we decline to go to theirs when they are in trouble.

But more: The second sentence of article 10 provides that in case of any aggression or threat of aggression, war or threat of war, the council shall advise as to the means by which this obligation is to be fulfilled. The United States is represented on that council, and accordingly, whenever occasion arises for action under article 10, the United States Government, through its representative upon the council, will sit with the other nations of the earth, voting in favor of the plan by which the obligation of article 10 is to be enforced and executed, while the United States declines to have anything to do with it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I want to get the Senator's view in order that I may present this matter in a different way a little later.

The Senator has spoken of the fact that the United States would have a representative on the council, and the council would sit in judgment upon the method by which we should execute article 10, and they would advise, after they had concluded their judgment, as to how it should be done. Just what is the obligation of the United States to comply with that advice after it has been pronounced by the council?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, if this reservation is adopted, there will not be any obligation at all.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean the reservation offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I mean the reservation offered by the committee. I am speaking about the reservation proposed by the committee. There would not be any obligation upon the United States. The United States would do then just as it could do now in a particular case coming up—it would determine whether it would go in or stay out.

Mr. BORAH. Then the reverse of that must be true, that unless we adopt this reservation the council could bind us, regardless of what the view of Congress might be?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; that is not true at all. The Senator and I have canvassed that matter before. Let us assume that we adopt the treaty with article 10 in it just exactly as it is. The obligation then arises, and the council advises as to the method by which it is to be enforced. The council will advise just the same as the general war council in Paris advised as to the military movements of the combined allied armies. We were not obliged to take their advice, but we deemed it wise to take it. So with respect to the council of the league. When they advise as to certain means by which this obligation is to be fulfilled, in all probability we will follow that advice. We are under no obligation to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Neither legal nor moral?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Neither legal nor moral.

Mr. BORAH. Then what possible thing does the reservation take away if there is no legal or moral obligation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is diverting.

Mr. BORAH. No; I am not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We have talked about this so many times that it seems to me profitless to discuss it further. The obligation rests upon the United States to discharge its obligaion under article 10, whether it takes the advice of the council or not.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is obliged to do those things which in its conscience it believes will fulfill its obligation.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, the first clause of article 10 creates a primary obligation, and we must fulfill that obligation in our own way if we do not see fit to fulfill it in the way the council advises.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think there is any doubt about that. That has always been my view, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. BORAH. I knew it was the Senator's view.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no escape, however, from the point to which I have now invited the attention of the Senate. We will say that Jugo-Slavia, to use the illustration employed a few moments ago, is assailed and attacked by Austria. We sit in the council of the league. We are one of the nine nations having representatives upon that body. The council determines that there should be a military movement against Austria to restrain her from overrunning Jugo-Slavia; or we will say the case of Poland, which is attacked by Russia upon the one side or Germany upon the other, and the council of the league determines that there should be a military movement. But the United States, it is understood in advance, while it sits in the council devising the plan, is under no kind of obligation to go in at all; the Congress of the United States will determine whether it will or whether it will not, upon any kind of considerations that may address themselves to the judgment and wisdom of that body.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator believe that the United States should be under an obligation to send its troops in there under such a plan?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I have spoken about that matter before. If it is under no obligation, if it will assume no obligation on the matter at all, why then should it not surrender its place upon the council so far as the determination of that question is concerned? In other words, Mr. President, in decency we can not adopt this reservation without an amendment under which the United States first releases other countries from their obligation to us; and, second, a provision under which it surrenders its position upon the council when the plan is being devised under which the obligation is to be fulfilled.

Mr. BORAH. That is just the question I rose to present to the Senator. I shall be glad to join with him in an amendment of the reservation which shall relieve such countries as Poland and Jugo-Slavia, and those countries, from coming to the rescue of the United States. I think we can afford to forego any benefits that will be given us under this legue from those countries, and I shall be glad to join with the able Senator from Montana to amend the reservation by inserting a clause that we relieve the other countries of the world from the obligations of article 10.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I dare say that if the Senator would propose that to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations he would be glad to tender the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. But if the Senator from Montana will join with the Senator from Idaho we may be able to put it in anyway.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Idaho will tender an amendment of that kind it will certainly have my vote.

Mr. BORAH. I am going to tender it if I can not get a better one. But, of course, when the amendment is put on I should want to see the reservation adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The amendment which was offered the other day by the Senator from Idaho to strike out this particular article accomplishes the full result that he desires and the particular result that is adverted to by the Senator from Montana this morning. So I think that particular amendment to strike out article 10 meets with the approval of both Senators.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is another remarkable feature of this reservation concerning which I desire to say a few words. Note the reading:

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose—> unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

That is a recital, Mr. President, of what is asserted to be a principle of constitutional law. Of course, the first part of it, that Congress has the sole power to declare war, no one can controvert. But I am desirous of having the Senators who are present this morning consider the next declaration of principle of international law, namely, that Congress has the sole power to authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States. If any declaration of that character should ever be made by the Senate of the United States, it would be singularly unfortunate. It is not true. It is not sound. It is fraught with the most momentous consequences, and may involve disasters the extent of which it is hardly possible to conceive.

The whole course of our history has been a refutation of such a declaration, namely, that the President of the United States, the Chief Executive of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, has no power to employ the land or naval forces without any express authorization upon the part of Congress. Since the beginning of our Government, our Navy has been sent over the seven seas and to every port in the world. Was there ever any congressional act authorizing the President to do anything of that kind?

Not only that, but our land forces have been employed again and again. By whose orders do they go? They go by order of the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. What do they go for? They go for the purpose of protecting the lives and the property of American citizens in foreign countries. That is why the Navy travels the sea, in order to safeguard and protect the rights of American citizens in foreign lands. Who can doubt that the President has authority thus to utilize the naval and land forces of the United States?

Senators will recall the dramatic incident in our history connected with the liberation of the Hungarian patriot Martin Koszta. He had participated in an unsuccessful rebellion against the Government of Austria and was obliged to flee for his life. He came to this country, declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and subsequently went into the domains of the Sultan of Turkey. He was seized by representatives of the Austrian Government upon the streets of the city of Smyrna, within the territorial domain of the Sultan of Turkey. He was hurried aboard an Austrian man-of-war. About that time Capt. Ingraham, commanding the U. S. sloop St. Louis, appeared in the harbor and demanded the surrender by the Austrian commander of his prisoner, and cleared his decks for action and threatened immediately, by the force of his guns, to compel the surrender of the prisoner. Hostilities were avoided by an agreement under which Koszta was placed in charge of the French consul, and subsequent diplomatic negotiations ensued between the foreign minister of Austria and Mr. Marcy, our Secretary of State, resulting in the release of Koszta. The Congress of the United States so highly approved, responsive to the feeling of the people of America, the conduct of Capt. Ingraham in this matter that they voted him a gold medal.

Are we here and now, in the midst of this debate and all its passions, engendered as they have been, to declare a principle of constitutional law to the effect that Ingraham was wrong in that matter and that President Fillmore ought to have rebuked him and perhaps discharged him from office and that the Congress of the United States in 1853 was wrong regardless of the provisions of the fundamental law that governed their action by voting a gold medal to Capt. Ingraham?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I agree fully with the legal or constitutional proposition which the Senator states, and I hope this will be stricken out. It is an act of supererogation to put it in. It does not amount to anything. It is a recital which is not true. It can not change the Constitution, and it ought not to be there. I agree with the Senator from Montana upon that proposition. I do not think, however, that putting it in would make any change. It would simply be vain and futile and, if I may say so, with due respect to those who drew it, the doing of an inconsequential thing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the view I take. Why, Mr. President, everybody has in mind the Boxer rebellion. Without any authorization on the part of Congress at all the President of the United States in that case directed every warship within reach to hurry to Chinese waters in order to protect the lives of American citizens there. Not only that, but he sent an army of 5,000 men through the territory of China to Peking in order to protect the lives of American citizens there. Now we declare that all that was wrong, and that the President was violating the Constitution of the United States in so doing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana relative to that matter, if he does not think the act just referred to came very near being an act of war, or that a similar act could easily bring on war?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, of course the line of demarcation between an act of that character which does not constitute war and an act which does constitute war or an act which constitutes an act of war is frequently very difficult to define; there is no doubt about that. We have landed troops in Central American countries repeatedly. In the particular instance referred to, however, the Senator will remember that practically all government in China had dissolved, a rebellion was in progress, so that it could hardly be said that there was not the same condition that to a very large extent to-day prevails in Russia. If we sent troops into Russia to-day for the purpose of protecting the lives or property of American citizens, I dare say we would not be making war upon Russia, because we do not recognize that there is any government in Russia against which we may make war.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Montana and I agree that there unquestionably are times when the President would be warranted in dispatching troops and sending vessels to stop the killing of American citizens. I think we both agree also that such authority could easily be abused and such a situation made a pretext, as I think it was in the case of the Boxer rebellion. I do not think the Government had broken down in China. They had rebellion, but I do not think we had any more right legally to interfere in China than England would have had to have thrown troops into this country in the case of the war between the North and South. I do not think we have any more right in Russia.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, but the Senator from Missouri will remember, of course, that our minister, with all his force, was cooped up in the city of Peking.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And it was for the purpose of relieving them that the expedition was undertaken.

Mr. REED. I have never thought that. I have thought that the Boxer invasion was for the purpose of subjugating and breaking up China. It was done by the autocratic forces of the world; and Japan is acting in consonance with that idea to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. However that may be, I dare say that the Senator from Missouri will not care to subscribe to the principle of law that the President of the United States can not employ the land or naval forces except pursuant to an express authorization by Congress.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, the only difference between the Senator and me on that point is that I doubt his construction of the language. I call the Senator's attention to this phrase, not for the purpose of getting into an argument about it, for it is not my business to defend the language; but the recital is, beginning in the middle of the sentence:

> Has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of military or naval forces of the United States.

Does not that mean in war?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No. If it means in war, then the two mean the same thing.

Mr. REED. Well, not exactly. My own idea is—I was not consulted and had nothing to do with drafting the reservation—that probably the man who drafted it intended it to mean as though it read that "the Congress under the Constitution has the sole power to declare war or to authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States in war"; and that the last two words "in war" are omitted because the drafter probably thought the language related back to and was governed by the preceding clause.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, that may be correct; but I rather think not. I think the language was drafted appropriately to express the idea that was in the mind of its framer.

The argument has been freely advanced that the President of the United States would use the land and naval forces to carry out the provisions of this treaty as he saw fit, and the phraseology was aimed at that condition of affairs. That, of course, could be taken care of by appropriate language; but this is not the appropriate language to take care of that idea. This is a straight declaration that the land and naval forces of the United States can not be used except by authorization of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator from Montana pardon another query?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. For those who desire no guaranty for this country from foreign countries nor wish to give to those countries any guaranty by ourselves is not the only logical position to strike out entirely Article 10?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Well, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from California that I do not believe that it would be impossible to draft an amendment to Article 10 under which it would remain in force in every way between the other nations who cared to subscribe to it, leaving us entirely free from its obligations and from any participation in the execution of it, and releasing all other nations from any obligation to us. I have not attempted to draft such an amendment, but it seems to me that it could be done, leaving the article still effective as between the other nations.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The point of the Senator's argument seems to me to be sound. As I understand the Senator, he objects to the acceptance of a guaranty on our part while we relieve ourselves of any guaranty toward other nations?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and not only that, but by tendering this reservation to them we invite them to enter into that kind of an arrangement with us.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. My position, if the Senator will permit me, is that I think our country neither requires nor do I want the guaranty of foreign countries for our political independence and territorial integrity; but, above all, I do not want our country to guarantee the political independence and territorial integrity of any other country on the face of the earth. Therefore if I could—I recognize its futility here—I would strike out Article 10 entirely as to every nation on the face of the earth in relation to the league covenant.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I appreciate the position of the Senator.

Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who interrogated me some time ago, is not present, because I now intend to canvass the idea which was embodied in his query. I preface by saying that this reservation leaves Article 10 in such shape that it imposes no obligation of any character whatever upon us. If Article 10 were stricken out of the treaty altogether, as suggested by the Senator from California, and any particular member of the league were attacked by another, if it became the victim of external aggression, of course, Congress could determine whether or not under such circumstances it would go to the help of the country attacked. For instance, if Poland should be attacked by Austria or by Germany we might consider that, by reason of our association with the genesis of the present Republic of Poland or by reason of the fact that it would be destroyed as a buffer State between Germany and Russia, we might consider that it would be for the interest of this country, for the protection and welfare of our people, to assist Poland and constrain Germany upon the one hand or Russia upon the other from their purposes against the young Republic of Poland. That is just what we will be permitted to do if this reservation goes into effect. We will be then entitled to canvass the whole merits of the situation, whether we shall go in or whether we shall not go in, exactly the same as though there were no reservation upon the subject at all and we did not subscribe in any way to Article 10; in other words, we will be entitled to do then, and shall proceed to do under this reservation, exactly what we would be entitled to do and just what we would proceed to do if the idea of the Senator from California were adopted and Article 10 were stricken altogether from the treaty.

Mr. President, I understand that it is the view of some Senators that with this reservation there will still remain something in the nature of a nebulous obligation upon the part of the United States; that at least when an act of external aggression takes place we shall still be called upon to enter into a consideration of whether the United States shall go in or shall not. I should regard such a situation as particularly vicious. I should feel that it would be an unfortunate thing for our country if a controversy arises in Europe and it is alleged that one country commits an act of external aggression against another that we should enter into the question at all as to the right or wrong of the controversy and grant or withhold our aid as we shou'd determine that question. I say now to the Senator from Michigan that is my view, as expressed here previously upon the floor, ...at under Article 10 we obligate ourselves, whenever an act of external aggression is committed, to go to the aid of the country that is attacked without any inquiry into the ultimate question as to where the right or the wrong of the controversy lies. The purpose is to stop the war and to compel the aggressor to submit its controversy or its dispute, whatever it may be, to the arbitrament of the council in case it can not be determined by arbitration. As I expressed it on the floor here previously, when the Hatfields go out to shoot up the McCoys or the McCoys go out to shoot up the Hatfields, we do not stop to inquire as to whether the Hatfields or the McCoys, as the case may be, deserve shooting up—in all probability they do by deeds of rapine and murder—that is not a matter of controversy at all; we go out and seize the parties who start the war; we put them in jail, prevent them from carrying out their purposes, and say to them, "If you have any controversy with these other people, you must submit it to the tribunals constituted for the purpose of determining such questions."

But, Mr. President, what is proposed now? It is proposed every time a war in Europe arises that the Congress of the United States shall determine whether it will go in or whether it will stay out upon what it deems to be the right or the wrong of the war. Everybody knows that if Germany begins a war against Poland every German in this country will be satisfied that Germany was justified in the matter, while every Pole, upon the other hand, will take the side of Poland; the country will be divided into two contending factions and become a breeding ground for propaganda of all character, such as we learned about in the late war.

Take Greece and Bulgaria. They may possibly enter into a war in relation to the boundary between those two countries in Thrace, and the question comes before Congress. Suppose that Greece invades Bulgaria. Instead of saying to Greece, "You may be right about this, but we will not permit you to make war on Bulgaria; bring your controversy to the council at Geneva and we will determine the matter there," the country is divided into two camps. Of course, all the predilections in this country will be in favor of Greece, the intellectual ancestor of all of us. Of course, she will have our sympathies, and, on the other hand, the Bulgarians may have the best of it from some other point of view; and we are again aligned into two hostile camps in this country, the question to be determined scarcely upon the right or wrong of the thing, but upon which foreign power has the greatest influence in this country. That is what you are inviting. That is what this reservation means.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think that conditions would be better if the people of this country were absolutely opposed to entering upon a war, but, nevertheless, did so only because of an obligation entered into by this Senate, perhaps 20 years before that time arose?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have stated my attitude about the matter. I think that the people of this country will very quickly understand the meaning of Article 10. I think they understand it fully now. It means that they do not consider whether the war is right or whether it is wrong; they go in to stop the war. That is what this league is intended for. That is what the people of this country want. They want you to stop the war, and make these people submit their controversies for determination in some other way.

Some time ago the distinguished ex-Senator from the State of New York, Mr. Root, wrote about this matter. He opposed Article 10 because he said it would array this country into two hostile camps in connection with every foreign war, or every war in Europe, the nationals of the one side seeking to get the country into the war upon that side, and the nationals of the other contestant or belligerent seeking to get it in on that side. No such condition at all would arise under Article 10 as it stands now, but that evil would be before us all the time if it were given an interpretation such as this reservation puts upon it.

That is all I desire to say about the reservation; but I desire to submit some remarks upon an argument concerning Article 10, made some time ago, that was entirely novel.

In a recent address by the junior Senator from Massachusetts the idea was advanced that under Article 10 of the covenant for a league of nations the right of asylum, in the case of political refugees, would no longer exist and that every other member of the league would be required to join forces with the sovereignty from whose justice the political offender fled to coerce his delivery should the request of the demanding State for his surrender be refused.

This extraordinary view was arrived at by assuming that for a State to harbor one charged with participating in an attempt to overthrow the government of another or to establish an independent government within any part of its dominions, would or might be considered as an act of "external aggression" against the latter within the meaning of that expression, as it is used in the article referred to.

Article 10 has been the center of the storm which has been aroused about the league. It has been the subject of the study of every critic of the covenant, many of them able and conscientious students of municipal and international law, others whose keenness of intellect rivaled the malignant disposition by which they were actuated. None whose views were deemed of sufficient importance to be accorded public notice, so far as I am informed, ever, until pointed out as stated, conceived the language used to have the effect attributed or to be susceptible of the construction given to it. Were the claim made by one less responsible for his utterances than a United States Senator, it might be characterized as preposterous and absurd. Avowed by a successor in this body of Webster, Sumner, and Hoar, it merits more than a passing notice.

If groundless, as I think it is, anything like general acceptance which might be accorded it were it left unchallenged would be a grievous wrong from every point of view, and particularly to the colleagues of the Senator supporting the league, who might properly enough under such circumstances be charged with indorsing so illiberal a principle and aligning themselves with statesmen so benighted as to attempt to impose it upon the world.

It is not quite clear whether the Senator takes the position that Article 10 actually destroys the right of asylum in the case of political offenses or whether he is simply disturbed lest a construction should be erroneously given to it which would so operate. The view last above indicated is supported by this sentence from his remarks:

> This dangerous provision (Article 10) may completely do away with the right of asylum in this country for persons charged with political offense, for it may be held to be an act of external aggression to harbor a political refugee.

But that expression is followed closely by this unequivocal assertion, namely:

> This provision (Article 10), however, would make it impossible for the United States to offer a place of refuge to those whom any of the allied Governments would be hounding for political reasons.

And then the Senator adds, deepening the doubt which his previous utterance created:

> This country might be obliged under this covenant to refuse admission to such men as were Carl Schurz, Dr. Jacobi, John Boyle O'Reilly, John Mitchell, and thousands of others who fortunately managed to escape the clutches of oppression.

What reason is there for imagining that any such construction could or might be given to the language in question? Is it within the realm, even, of a wild and fantastic fancy?

Article 10 reads:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

The question before us turns upon the significance of the word "aggression." The Century Dictionary defines it and illustrates its use as follows:

> Aggression: The act of proceeding to hostilities or invasion; a breach of the peace or right of another or others; an assault, inroad, or encroachment; hence, any offensive action or procedure, as an aggression upon a country or upon vested rights or liberties.
> "We have undertaken to resent a supreme insult and have had to bear new insults and aggressions, even to the direct menace of our National Capital." (O. W. Holmes, old volume of Life.)
> 2. The practice of making assaults or attacks; offensive action in general.
> "Only this policy of unceasing and untiring aggression, this wearing out and crushing out, this war upon all the resources and all the armies of the rebellion, could now succeed." (Badeau, Military History of Grant, II, 10.)
> Synonyms: Attack, invasion, assault, encroachment, injury, offense.

Webster says:

> Aggression: A first or unprovoked attack or act of hostility; the first act of injury or first act leading to a war or a controversy; practice of encroachment; assault; as, a war of aggression.
> "Aggressions of power." (Hallam.)
> Synonyms: Attack, invasion, assault, encroachment, injury, offense, intrusion, provocation.

The Standard has the following:

> Aggression: An unprovoked attack; unwarranted inroad or encroachment upon the rights of another, whether prompted by hostility or not; also, the committing of such attacks or encroachments.
> "Nations have seemed to court aggression and bondage." (Channing Works, Napoleon Bonaparte, p. 523.)
> Synonyms: Assault, attack, encroachment, incursion, intrusion, invasion, onslaught, trespass. An attack may be by word; an aggression is always by deed. An assault may be upon the person, an aggression is upon rights, possessions, etc. An invasion of a nation's territory is an act of aggression; an intrusion upon a neighboring estate is a trespass; onslaught signifies intensely violent assault, as by an army or a desperado, though it is sometimes used of violent speech.

Unquestionably the word is used in the covenant in the primary sense given to it by the lexicographers, as "The act of proceeding to hostilities or invasion."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Montana inform us who is to interpret the words "external aggression"?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will say to the Senator that I will discuss that later in my remarks.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator also inform us, now or later, upon what theory, if the report is true, is the State Department of the United States Government at the present time undertaking to deport Hindu political prisoners at the request of the British Government, if it is not that they are in this country doing an act of aggression against the British Empire?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that is a diversion. There is no law, so far as my information now goes, which authorizes at the present time the deportation of these Hindu prisoners. At least, they think so, and I think they are right about it. There is pending, however, a bill under which it is feared their deportation may be accomplished. I have undertaken myself to draft an amendment to that bill so that their deportation may not be accomplished; but the thing has no relation to the matter of which the Senator speaks. Whatever crime these Hindus committed they did not commit in India, and there is no request for their extradition to India in order that they may answer for crimes committed against the British Government. If they are deported, it is because of crimes committed in this country, and against the dignity and the sovereignty of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly the Senator later will discuss the question I am about to ask, but I would like to have him state the meaning of the words "any threat or danger of such aggression," and who, if not the council, is to advise as to the meaning and as to the means by which the members of the league undertake to respect and preserve the political integrity of all members of the league.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, "danger or threat" is of no significance, but the word "aggression" is the significant word. If we commit an act of aggression by the harboring of political prisoners, then the Senator is correct. I have undertaken to show, by the definition of the word "aggression," that it can have no such possible significance. I am now going to consider the question, regardless of the definition, as to whether the harboring of political offenders is an act of aggression, or one which gives, or ought to give, any offense to any country. If I do not fully cover the matter, I should be obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts if he will interrupt me at any time.

The league is designed, however it may operate, to prevent wars. Having in mind the purpose of its projectors as revealed in the whole covenant, no less than by their public declarations, to provide for the settlement of international controversies by negotiation and arbitral methods rather than by war, and to constrain the nations of the earth to pursue the peaceful plan proposed in case of differences rather than to resort to hostilities, the fair-minded man can scarcely harbor a doubt that the word was used in the restricted sense last above indicated.

It is true that in a derivative sense the word "aggression" has come to mean "any offensive action or procedure." (Century Dictionary.) But it can not be possible that it is in that sense the word is used in Article 10. I shall inquire presently whether the harboring of political refugees is "offensive action or procedure." It might be remarked that both words "action" and "procedure" imply the doing of something—some initiative—while what might be complained of in the case of political refugees is the failure on the part of the Government of the country of asylum to do something, and particularly the thing requested or demanded, namely, to arrest and surrender the alleged offender; that is to say, that doing nothing is not aggression.

To return to the inquiry as to whether the word "aggression" as used in Article 10 can mean "any offensive action or procedure." If it does, then not only the failure to arrest and surrender political refugees, if that is such conduct, and I shall demonstrate that it is not, but any other offensive action or procedure on the part of one member of the league against another, threatening its territorial integrity or political independence, would call into activity against the offender every other member of the league, as provided in Article 10. It is easily conceivable that some would reach the conclusion that the act complained of was not "offensive," but was clearly within the right of the nation committing it; what is or is not the right of a country under given circumstances is often a matter of very grave doubt. International law is far from being an exact science. Others might believe that, though the act was unjustifiable, it did not threaten either the territorial integrity or the political independence of the offended State. The facts might be in dispute so that none could definitely determine either element involved. Nothing like concert of action could be expected. The idea can not be entertained for a moment that the language used in Article 10 contemplates anything short of war entered upon or threatened.

But if the expression "external aggression" does extend to and embrace "any offensive action or procedure," it would not include according asylum to those accused of political offenses. By no rule recognized anywhere can such conduct be regarded by any nation as "offensive action or procedure" in another.

There is no obligation resting upon any nation, under international law, in the absence of a treaty so requiring, to surrender to another a person accused by the latter of any offense, much less a political offense. It follows that no nation has the right to require that another deliver up a fugitive from justice. The one having no right to require the surrender and the other being under no obligation to surrender, there can be no offense in the refusal of the Government of the country in which the refugee has sought asylum to surrender him.

Upon considerations of comity fugitives have been not infrequently surrendered by one nation to another, and statesmen and jurists have argued with much force and reason that the practice of so doing should have the sanction of international law save as to political offenders; but the principle for which they contend has never been recognized in this country or in Great Britain nor elsewhere to any important degree among the family of nations.

Mr. Webster, while Secretary of State, wrote:

Although such extradition is sometimes made, yet in the absence of treaty stipulations it is always a matter of comity or courtesy. No government is understood to be bound by the positive law of nations to deliver up criminals, fugitives from justice, who have sought an asylum within its limits.

In Jose Ferreira dos Santos's case (2 Brock., 493), the court, through Judge Barbour, said:

A nation whose citizen or subject commits a crime within its own jurisdiction, and is afterwards found within that of another, has no right by the law of nations, upon its demand, to have him delivered up by that other for the purpose of being tried where the crime was committed.

The Supreme Court of the United States in Raucher v. United States (119 U. S., 407, 411–412), expressing, it will be noted, not the law of this country but the law of nations, said:

It may be stated as the general result of the writers on international law that there was no well-defined obligation on one country to deliver up such fugitives (from justice) to another, and though such delivery was often made it was upon the principle of comity and within the discretion of the government whose action was invoked; and it has never been recognized as among those obligations of one government toward another which rest upon established principles of international law.

Mr. Buchanan, while Secretary of State, wrote in 1845 to our minister to Brazil as follows:

Whatever elementary authors may say to the contrary, one nation is not bound to deliver up persons accused of crimes who have escaped into its territories on the demand of another nation against whose laws the alleged crime was committed. The Government of the United States has from the very beginning acted on this principle. Mr. Jefferson, when Secretary of State under the administration of Gen. Washington, declared that "the laws of this country take no notice of crimes committed out of their jurisdiction. The most atrocious offender, coming within our pale, is received by them as an innocent man, and they have authorized no one to seize or deliver him." It has been contrary to the practice of the United States even to request as a favor that the government of another country should deliver up a fugitive from criminal justice, because under our laws we possess no power to reciprocate such an act of grace. * * * The truth is that it has been for a long time well settled, both by the law and practice of nations, that, without a treaty stipulation, one government is not under any obligation to surrender a fugitive from justice to another government for trial.

In accordance with the policy thus outlined, Attorney General Black, in an official opinion, declared that—

It is the established rule of the United States neither to grant nor ask for extradition of criminals unless in cases for which stipulation is made by express covenant. (6 O. P. Atty. Gen., 85.)

It will be noted that the United States as a rule does not even "request as a favor" the extradition of one who has fled from this country to another under no treaty obligation to deliver him up. In the few cases in which there has been a departure from this rule attention has been called to the fact that this country could not, and would not, reciprocate. Notwithstanding this, Spain, at the request of our Government, surrendered up the notorious William M. Tweed, who had fled to Cuba, perhaps reasoning that she was well rid of such an undesirable sojourner. After referring to authorities who contend that fugitives should be surrendered a celebrated English writer says:

On the other hand, Puffendorf holds that a State is only bound by treaty engagement, or by some special circumstance, to surrender a fugitive criminal. The majority of modern writers adopt a similar view and make extradition a question of national comity, in the absence of express stipulation. According to the generally received doctrine, if a person commits a crime, of whatever character or magnitude it may be, in one State and escapes into another State the former State can not demand his extradition as a matter of right from the latter State. The refusal of such a demand might be an unreasonable or an unfriendly act; but it could scarcely be an act which would be held to justify menace or reprisals, or war, in the case of powers of equal magnitude, or to justify coercion by a stronger over a weaker power.

The author adds:

With respect to England, Lord Coke long since laid down the general doctrine that it was a part of the laws and liberties of a kingdom that fugitives were not to be surrendered. "It is holden," he says in his Third Institute, "and so it hath been resolved, that divided kingdoms under several kings, in league one with another, are sanctuaries for servants or subjects flying for safety from one kingdom to another; and upon demand made by them are not, by the laws and liberties of kingdoms, to be delivered."

It appears, accordingly, to be a well-settled principle of international law that, except pursuant to a treaty, a nation is guilty of no offense toward another by refusing to surrender any fugitive from justice whatever may be the character of the crime of which he is accused. In the case of political refugees, however, not only is there no right to have such surrendered to the country from which they fled, not only are they safe by the almost invariable custom of nations in modern times from arrest and delivery upon considerations of comity, but the nation that should refuse asylum to such or surrender them to the justice or vengeance of another would subject itself to general reproach.

In the case of Martin Koszta, Secretary of State Marcy, in 1853, wrote to the representative of the Austrian Government, as follows:

No State can demand from any other, as a matter of right, the surrender of a native-born or naturalized citizen or subject, an emigrant, or even a fugitive from justice, unless the demand is authorized by express treaty stipulation. Internal law allows no such claim, though comity may sometimes yield what right withholds. To surrender political offenders (and in this class Austria places Koszta) is not a duty; but, on the contrary, compliance with such a demand would be considered a dishonorable subserviency to a foreign power and an act meriting the reprobation of mankind.

Koszta had fled to Turkey, from the Sultan of which country he was demanded by Austria, similar demand being made at the some time concerning certain Polish refugees by Russia. Touching the affair, Mr. Marcy said in the letter from which the quotation above is taken:

This demand was made in concert as it were by two powerful sovereigns, while their triumphant armies, which had just put an end to the revolutionary movements in Hungary, stood upon the borders of Turkey, with power to erase her name from the list of nations. She might well apprehend for herself, as the nations of western Europe apprehended for her, that a refusal in her critical condition would put in jeopardy her existence as an independent power; but she did refuse, and the civilized world justified and commended the act.

And he added concerning the stand taken by the Sultan:

This decision deeply interested not only rulers and statesmen but the great body of the people of every country. They investigated its merits, admitted its justice, and commended the firmness and humanity of the Sultan for his course.

When in 1799 the Senate of Hamburg, on the demand of the British Government, delivered up Napper Tandy, the popular hero of the Irish revolution of the preceding year, Napoleon wrote to the obsequious authorities of that city a letter in which, with withering scorn, he said:

Your letter does not justify your conduct. Virtue and courage are the support of States, servility their baseness and ruin. You have violated the laws of hospitality in a manner which would bring the blush of shame to the wandering tribes of the desert.

Many of our extradition treaties provide that they shall not be construed to extend to requiring the surrender of persons accused of political offenses, but the principle that such are never surrendered is so well established that however general may be the language it will be construed as carrying an exemption giving immunity to political offenders. Neither the treaty of 1794 nor the treaty of 1842 with Great Britain excepted offenses of a political nature, but it was held that such a provision was necesssarily implied. Touching them Secretary Hamilton Fish wrote:

Neither treaty contains any reference to immunity for political offenses or to the protection of asylum for political or religious refugees. The public sentiment of both countries made it unnecessary. Between the United States and Great Britain it was not supposed on either side that guaranties were required of each against a thing inherently impossible, any more than by the laws of Solon was a punishment being necessary against the crime of parricide, which was beyond the possibility of contemplation.

That this statement is wholly justified as to Great Britain is indisputable considering the repeated assertion of the rule by her statesmen and jurists.

In a debate in the House of Commons in 1815 Sir James McIntosh said:

I believe that I may venture to lay it down, if not as a part of the consuetudinary law of nations at least as agreeable to the usage of modern times, that though nations may often agree mutually to give up persons charged with the common offenses against all human society, civilized States afford an inviolable asylum to political emigrants.

The controversy over the demand by Austria for the surrender of Koszta and his compatriots drew from Lord Palmerston the following:

If there is one rule which more than another has been observed in modern times by all independent States, both great and small, of the civilized world, it is the rule not to deliver up political refugees unless the State is bound to do so by the positive stipulations of a treaty; and Her Majesty's Government believe that such treaty engagements are few, if indeed any such exist. The laws of hospitality, the dictates of humanity, the general feelings of mankind forbid such surrender, and any independent government which of its own free will were to make such a surrender would be deservedly and universally stigmatized as degraded and dishonored.

Westlake, a writer on international law, asserts that extradition for political offenders can not be claimed by any international right and can not be conceded without shocking the sentiment of free countries.

Oppenheim, speaking of the general adoption of the rule, says that—

It is due to the stern attitude of Great Britain, Switzerland, Belgium, France, and the United States that the principle has conquered the world.

Vigne, an eminent lawyer of Ghent, writing in 1870 in the Revue de droit International, declares that "concerning political offenses but one rule is fair, that of recognizing absolutely the right of sanctuary," and he adds that "the one exception still existing to this rule is the treaty of January 4, 1834, between Prussia, Austria, and Russia concerning the extradition of Polish refugees."

Both Great Britain and the United States, in order to guard against any possible interpretation of any treaties into which they have entered or might enter, expressly forbid by law the extradition of political offenders. The British extradition act of 1870 provides as follows:

A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered if the offense in respect to which his surrender is demanded is one of a political character or if he prove to the satisfaction of the police magistrate or the court before whom he is brought on habeas corpus or to the secretary of state that the requisition for his surrender has in fact been made with a view to try to punish him for an offense of a political character.

Our statute is more brief but not less pointed. It reads:

No return or surrender shall be made of any person charged with the commission of any offense of a political nature. (R. S. U. S., 570.)

In both countries it is held that the magistrate, to whom application is first made for a warrant of arrest, and the court afterwards on habeas corpus, is entitled to go into the facts with a view to determine whether the offense with which the refugee is charged is political in character or the acts constituting it were incident to a revolutionary or other political movement.

It is perfectly clear, accordingly, that no nation can be heard to say that the refusal of another to surrender one accused by the demanding country of a crime that is political in character is guilty of "aggression" against the former, or that such conduct is "offensive action or procedure." If the nation affording asylum is under no obligation to surrender, if it would subject itself to universal scorn and obloquy if it did surrender, how can the nation from which the refugee fled assert that its refusal to surrender is "offensive action or procedure"? And what reason is there to believe that any body of representatives of the enlightened nations of the earth, such as the council of the league, would admit such a claim should any nation have the hardihood, not to say effrontery, to assert it?

I am not surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts is against the covenant, believing either that it annihilates the right of asylum in the case of political refugees or that there is in it any language which, even upon a strained construction, would have that effect. I should be against the league, too, if I held the view he has expressed, as quoted, and I know of no one on this side of the Chamber, or upon the other, for that matter, who, were the idea he has advanced admissible at all, would give it his support. It is inconceivable to me how any such conclusion could have been arrived at by the able Senator from Massachusetts had he studied the covenant with an impartial mind, not to say a sympathetic predilection.

It is to be gathered from the remarks of the Senator in this connection that though there may be no just ground for assigning any such significance to the language of Article 10, some authority may, in total disregard of reason, moved by a set purpose to throttle the efforts of liberty-loving people to attain independence, give to it the meaning against which he warns us. I quote:

To be sure, Article 10 has "external aggression" provided for as a condition for the guaranty, but who is to decide what "external aggression" means? Who is to tell what are the limitations of this phraseology? What is involved in the phrase "its existing political independence"? Is hatred of a King, a Czar, a tyrant; is a desire to obtain a government based upon the consent of the governed an interference with "existing political independence"? If the present attitude of certain of our allies toward subject people is any criterion, I fear it would be so considered.

Fear it would be so considered by whom?

Article 10 reads:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such agression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

It confers no power, vests no authority by the initial sentence in the league or in the council or in the assembly. The league does not guarantee to preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of its members. The obligation is not undertaken by the league. It rests upon each member of the league. Each member, for itself, determines whether one has committed or is about to commit an act of external aggression against another, and to act or decline to act accordingly. Political offenders flee from Ireland and take refuge in France. Imagine Great Britain demanding their surrender and calling upon the world to make war upon France as having committed an act of external aggression by granting them asylum. We would laugh at her. Imagine them fleeing to this country and England calling upon the nations to coerce us into surrendering them. In view of the state of the law, briefly reviewed, what country is it feared would respond to such an outrageous contention concerning the obligation it undertook by subscribing to Article 10? I have not overlooked the concluding sentence thereof:

In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

When the obligation is admitted the council advises how it is to be discharged. France has been a haven for political refugees from all over Europe; Switzerland has not been without a colony of emigrés for a century; Rome has consistently sheltered the objects of the wrath of the Czars earned in the long effort to overthrow absolutism in that sorely tried country; the cities of Italy, according to recent press reports, are shielding the Russian grand dukes from the just wrath of the people they oppressed and betrayed. Holland is even now affording asylum to the last of the Hohenzollerns, who may be surrendered to France or Belgium for crimes committed within their territory, but who can not be delivered up to his political enemies in his own country, from which he ignominiously fled, while the Dutch prize the respect or care to avoid the contempt of mankind. England herself has been the favorite resort of those whom political turmoil have driven from their homes in Europe, extending to them a hospitality which has, so far as I am advised, never been violated. The Empress Eugenia, fleeing from the Commune in 1870, has ever since found a home there. All of these nations have taken a pride in the part they have had in establishing as a principle of international law the sanctity of the right of asylum in the case of political offenders. Which of them will respond to a call to make war upon a neighbor which declines to violate the rule of hospitality in the case of such? Which of them will either admit or contend that it gave its approval to any treaty which so bound it? The idea is too fantastic for speculation, even.

The nations recognizing that external aggression has actually been perpetrated or is threatened, they confer together to map out a plan by which it is to be resisted and overcome. When this country entered the war it did not conceive a program of military and naval action of its own independent of its allies. It sent its representative to the supreme war council, which worked out a plan, in the execution of which all the allied and associated powers had their allotted parts. This country was under no obligation to follow that plan. All the war council could do, so far as we were concerned, was to advise. Our commanders chose, and doubtless wisely, to play their part in the concerted plan. So the council of the league of nations is expected to advise, should occasion arise, for the concert of action contemplated by Article 10. It has no power to declare that a certain act or series of acts constitutes external aggression and to issue any mandate to the member nations. No such authority is given it by Article 10 or by any other article of the covenant. The fear that has been expressed in that regard is—

Wrought of such stuff as dreams, and as baseless
As the fantastic visions of the evening.

I am not unmindful, notwithstanding anything that may have been said in the course of these remarks, that the Senator gave the assurance in his address that he is in favor of a league of nations. But what kind of a league would he see undertake the task of preserving the peace of the world? For that, I take it, is the end for which a league of nations is proposed. It contemplates the substitution of some means of settling international disputes other than by war, by requiring the submission of all such to some kind of a board of conciliation or arbitration or to a tribunal having judicial powers, the judgment or determination of which would be supported by the enlightened opinion of the world, so that no further sanction would be necessary or would be enforced by concerted economic pressure or military coercion as a last resort.

It is quite plain that, having the case of Ireland in mind, the very crux of the objections so eloquently urged to the covenant by the Senator from Massachusetts is that under Article 10 no nation being a member of the league can join as a belligerent revolutionist within another country seeking to overthrow its government or to establish their independence except it violate its own treaty obligation and bring into the field against it all members of the league. It is regarded by many as a sufficient argument against Article 10 that it would, had it been a feature of a covenant governing a league of nations at that time, have prevented France from coming to our aid in securing the independence of the United States. I have heretofore called attention to the fact that France's interposition in that contest was, contrary to the belief inculcated by the school histories, by no means unselfish. But that criticism would be almost, if not quite, as valid against the covenant if Article 10 were entirely eliminated—a circumstance to which I call the attention of all those who are seeking to emasculate or excise it. The pruning process may be carried much further to meet objections to the covenant such as those referred to. Assume Article 10 to be eliminated from the covenant, that it thus altered comes into force, that the Filipinos rise in insurrection, and that Japan is preparing to assist them with money and men in the rebellion. Naturally the United States protests and a dispute arises between this country and Japan. Under Article 12 Japan has bound herself to submit the dispute to arbitration or to inquiry by the council and not to go to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council. Should she go to war without having done so, she is to be deemed, under Article 15, to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which might not only repel the aggression, but which would forthwith sever all trade relations with her and interdict all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse with her nationals. In other words, the whole world would unite, if she took such a course, in commercial war upon her, and any nation would be entitled to regard her offense as a justification for resort to arms against her.

The truth is that the elimination or removal of the chance of foreign aid to deserving revolutionists is an evil which inheres in the system of a league of nations to preserve the peace as between the members thereof. Any who regard that chance as sacred can pursue a logical course only by aligning themselves with those who boldly announce their opposition to any league of nations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator if he has read—and of course he has—the original Article 10 that was offered by President Wilson at the peace conference?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I have read it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does it differ from Article 10 as it is incorporated in the league covenant which is now before us?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; it does.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator if he really believed that the present Article 10 tended to establish a league of nations providing for permanent peace upon the theory that a combination of the financial and political strength of the nations of the world will preserve it, would he support such a league?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Well, I have not been able to follow the question addressed to me by the Senator from Massachusetts, and it is in a way diverting and quite aside from the question I am now discussing. I am endeavoring now to point out to the Senator from Massachusetts that if he absolutely strikes out Article 10, if it is not in the treaty at all, the main objection that he has to it will still inhere in the league, for if any nation should come to the aid of the revolutionists within a certain country that nation would violate its obligations under Article 12 and Article 15, and would commit an act of war against every other member of the league, which obligates itself immediately to sever all commercial relations with it; in other words, by striking out Article 10 the Senator would not improve the situation at all.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Montana that my objection to Article 10 is that it perpetuates a status quo condition and removes the opportunity in the future for the readjustment of boundary lines or the evolution of races and peoples. That belief and that interpretation of Article 10, I think, constitute the difference between the Senator's viewpoint and my own.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not intend to make a general review of the address of the Senator from Massachusetts, nor to canvass the various views that he expressed in it, simply because most of those views have been the subject of consideration heretofore. These two ideas, however, are, in a way, novel, and I am endeavoring to confine myself to those. In the first place, I have endeavored to meet the idea that Article 10 destroys the right of asylum of political refugees; and, secondly, I contend that the main objection to Article 10 will still inhere in the covenant by virtue of the provisions of other articles thereof, though Article 10 should be entirely eliminated.

Arbitration treaties operate similarly. We are even now bound by a treaty with Great Britain which would be held by us a mere "scrap of paper" were we to join Irish insurrectionists. This is one of the celebrated Bryan treaties negotiated with different nations, of which Article 1 reads as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that all disputes between them, of every nature whatsoever, other than disputes the settlement of which is provided for and in fact achieved under existing agreements between the high contracting parties, shall, when diplomatic methods of adjustment have failed, be referred for investigation and report to a permanent international commission, to be constituted in the manner prescribed in the next succeeding article, and they agree not to declare war or begin hostilities during such investigation and before the report is submitted.

Germany declined our proffer of a similar treaty with her. Like some United States Senators, she did not believe in the settlement of international disputes on that plan. Whether she has been converted from the "blood and iron" way remains to be seen.

There is only one other feature of the address of the Senator from Massachusetts to which I desire to advert. "If," he declared, "choice must be made between a league of nations and the Constitution of the United States, I am first and last with the Constitution." This sentiment, impressively expressed, drew a quick response from the galleries despite the efforts of the attendants to suppress it, rivaling that accorded his colleague when the latter solemnly declared himself to be an American. Of course, if a choice must be made between the Constitution and the league of nations, the Senator from Massachusetts is for the Constitution. His oath, to which no one can doubt he yields ready obedience, requires that he take that course. But is he put to any such choice? We are not advised by anything he has said in what respect the covenant contravenes the Constitution or may be deemed to be in violation of it. At an early stage of the debate it was denounced as in plain violation of our fundamental law, though no Senator ever undertook to demonstrate by any consideration of the subject the validity of the charge. Others, more cautious, contented themselves with inquiring whether, in view of certain provisions of the Constitution, the covenant was not violative of it. Repetition, taking the place of argument, began to leave some impression upon the public mind when the question was exhaustively reviewed on the floor, first on the Democratic and then upon the Republican side, and the full power of our Government in the premises vindicated. No one attempted to answer the argument, and reliance on the ground of objections abated; but the press, at least, advanced objections to the treaty with France which came to the Senate quite like those considered as stated against the covenant. Moved by the suggestions thus made, the Senate directed its Committee on the Judiciary to inquire and report as to whether there are any constitutional objections to the treaty referred to. It reported that there are not, and it made a part of the report the main portions of the addresses referred to. The report was not unanimous, but no member of the committee dissented—that is to say, some members simply withheld their assent. No member of the committee attempted to uphold the claim that the Constitution forbids our Government entering into obligations such as the covenant imposes, though three expressed some doubt. At the request of one of these, the senior Senator from Missouri, the committee withheld its report for three weeks, that he might, should he determine to do so, submit either a written or oral argument sustaining a contrary view. In view of the prodigious industry and the high legal ability of the Senator from Missouri, not to speak of his supremacy in advocacy, the inference is reasonable that he found it impossible to justify a minority report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. REED. Lest the remarks of the Senator lead to an erroneous conclusion in connection with his reference to me, he will have to permit me, in the interest of fairness, to say that from the day I asked for time to consider the questions involved in the French treaty my time was either so taken up with work of an imperative nature, or I have been incapacitated for work altogether by illness, that I have not been able to give the subject a moment's time. I do not want my failure, therefore, to be taken as any abandonment of my opinion that the whole spirit of the league of nations, while it may possibly have technically avoided a violation of the Constitution by reserving to the nations a right of determination if technically followed, if carried out is an absolute violation of the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there was no partisan tinge to the report of the committee. It was expressly concurred in by four Republican members, including the venerable and vigorous chairman of the committee, and the senior Senator from Rhode Island, a jurist of the highest standing, long a United States circuit judge. It was in this situation, of which possibly the country may not be fully apprised or of which such knowledge as it gained had been more or less obliterated by time, that the Senator gave the assurance, presumably in justification of his attitude, that if compelled to choose between the league of nations and the Constitution he would stand by the Constitution.

I indulge the hope that he may yet reach the conclusion that he has given undue importance to some of the considerations which led him to differ with his party associates in the Senate with respect to the important subject before us, and that he will, on a reexamination of the covenant, find it as they do, though imperfect, the best practical plan that has ever been proposed as a basis for a league of nations, through which the unspeakable horrors of war are, so far as is humanly possible, to be averted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word, not in reply but in way of explanation to the Senator's reference to the report of the Judiciary Committee upon the French treaty or proposed French alliance. I was so occupied with other matters, particularly the league of nations, that I was not present when the matter of the proposed French treaty was considered by the Judiciary Committee; but I read the report as it was proposed to be adopted by the committee as a whole. After doing so, I addressed a letter to the chairman of the committee, in which I stated that while I did not disagree with that portion of the report which permitted us to make a treaty of alliance with any other nation, I did not agree with that portion of the report which held that the function of the league of nations, with reference to that treaty, was constitutional. I simply state this so that I may not be confronted by the statement of the Senator when, in the future, I shall undertake to present that feature of the question to the Senate.

Mr. President, I desire to say a few words with reference to this reservation to article 10. I am not encouraged to offer any amendments or reservations as substitutes for the reservation reported, because I understand, of course, that the other side of the Chamber will vote against any reservation of any kind and that this side of the Chamber will vote for the program. Nevertheless, I want to say a few words, in order that my position may be understood.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator define what he means when he says that his side of the Chamber will vote "in accordance with the program"?

Mr. BORAH. The reservation program.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is it?

Mr. BORAH. It has been printed here, and we have been dealing with it for the last three days.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state who agreed to it?

Mr. BORAH. Well, I do not know who has; but I know who has not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is not prepared to state that they have openly arrived at any program?

Mr. BORAH. I think it was openly arrived at by a consultation between all parties, even the enemy. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, this reservation which we are about to dispose of reads as follows—I am not speaking now of the substitute, because, of course, we will dispose of it without very much trouble:

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Of course, the Congress of the United States has the sole power to declare war, but it has not the sole power to authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States. The President, as Commander in Chief, has certain powers with reference to the Army and the Navy, and we can not by act of Congress or by treaty deprive the President of that power; and we not only have not the sole power to authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, but we have no power at all in regard to it, except in certain instances and under certain conditions.

That, however, is a mere recital, and, I presume, upon reflection may be stricken out. It ought to be. It is a recital that is not based upon the Constitution, upon precedent, or upon reason; and for manifest reasons, when we are dealing with a treaty which will be viewed by other people and considered by other people, it ought not to be there, as calculated to mislead other people as to the power of Congress over the Army and the Navy.

But there is another particular clause here which is much more significant and important, and that is this:

> Or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose.

If we make this treaty with the terms and conditions still in it which thus far have been unassailed either by proposed amendments or reservations, it will not be within our power, through the treaty-making power, to say that the military or naval forces of the United States shall not be employed for any purpose under the treaty, except as authorized by Congress. There will be a vast domain of action which the President of the United States under the Constitution will have the sole right to determine in the employment of the naval or the military forces. If we enter into the treaty and these terms and conditions are still in the treaty which obligate in certain instances or which permit the use of the Army and the Navy for the purposes of policing a situation for preserving peace, we can not under the treaty-making power reserve to Congress the right to say just when that shall be done and how it shall be done.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If there were no such treaty at all, does the Senator think that the President might utilize the military forces for such policing?

Mr. BORAH. I am going to come to that in a moment. It brings out the question which I want to accentuate, and I am glad the Senator asked the question. It makes it more pointed.

In other words, if the treaty is made and the obligation rests upon the United States to perform certain duties under the treaty, such as the policing of a situation under the treaty, I can well imagine that the President would be justified in sending the troops to perform that duty under the treaty, whereas if he should send them without any treaty at all he might be encroaching upon the sovereignty or jurisdiction of another country without any color of authority at all.

In other words, if the President of the United States should send troops to Silesia if we had no treaty at all, no obligation to preserve peace or police a situation, we might have the remedy of impeachment on the ground that he would have no business in that country with the troops. It would be calculated to incite war; it would be calculated to bring on conflict with that country; and therefore we might very well resort to the power of impeachment, and in my judgment he would have no defense. It would be one of the things he is not, as an Executive, authorized to do—to wit, to send his troops into that country, unless, as in the case spoken of by the Senator from Montana, it is for the purpose of protecting some particular right, such as the lives of our citizens, their property, and so forth. But if we make a treaty in which we engage with all of the other nations of the world to preserve peace and to police the situation against war throughout the world, and he does send troops to Silesia, and the question of impeachment arises, has he not a perfect defense in the proposition that a treaty of the United States has been entered into, under which treaty he deemed it wise to send troops to a certain part of the world for the purpose of policing the situation?

To state it in another way, it takes away from the President the justification of doing that when there is no treaty, which justification he would find in the terms of the treaty itself. But I shall come to that in a few moments.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know that I quite followed the Senator; but, as I understand him, he said that if we engaged to police any portion of the world, then the President could send troops.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. But does not this reservation relieve us of that obligation?

Mr. BORAH. It does with reference to article 10 to a certain extent; but I am coming to article 11, and some other articels which I want to take up in connection with it. Before I do that, however, permit me to call attention to one or two citations, which I used the other day and which I desire to amplify by citing others, as to the power of the Commander in Chief over the Army and the Navy. Undoubtedly no power rests anywhere to declare war except in Congress; but a vast number of things may be done by the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, some of which may lead to war, without any authority of Congress at all.

It was contended by some of the ablest lawyers in the country, when the President asked authority to send the Navy to Vera Cruz, that he had perfect authority to do it without the action of Congress; that he could send the Navy there for the purpose of protecting our rights and our interests, not for the purpose of engaging in war, but for the purpose of protecting our rights, without the authority of Congress. If I remember correctly, the President in his message to Congress stated that in his judgment he had the authority to do so without any authority from Congress, but that he felt disposed to consult Congress, and take its approval of his conduct.

Mr. Pomeroy, in his Commentaries upon the Constitution, says:

> Congress raises and supplies armies and navies and makes rules for their government, and there its power and duty end; the additional power of the President as supreme commander is independent and absolute.

All things which pertain to or inhere in the right to command, wherever the line of demarcation may be, belong to the Commander in Chief, and the Congress can not intrench upon that right. We may refuse to raise the army, we may refuse to provide for a navy, we may refuse munitions and supplies, and we may make certain rules and regulations for the governing of the army as an army, but when the army is raised and the munitions provided for, and the navy is at hand, that which relates to the right to command, to station the troops here or there, or to assign them to this place or to that place, belongs to the President of the United States. My idea is that when we become a part of a world scheme to preserve peace, and cover the entire transaction by a treaty, assuming now that we have the power to make this treaty at all relative to those things, then the President has the authority on this side of a declaration of war to station his troops, if he sees fit, in accordance with the commands of that treaty for the purpose of carrying out both the letter and the spirit of the treaty; and if he does station his trooops in any part of the world under the advice of the council or the assembly or under what he conceives to be the construction of article 11, and impeachment of the President is sought, it seems to me that he has then what he would not have otherwise—a perfect defense in a treaty of the United States.

Again, the same author says:

> The legislative powers which relate to the raising, equipping, supplying, and governing the land and naval forces have nothing in common with the separate and distinct function of commanding those forces; no particular statutes passed under the former class of attributes can interfere with the President in his exercise of the latter. Even the general clause of Article I, section 8 (par. 18), which authorizes Congress to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers conferred upon any department of the Government, can not permit the Congress to assume the capacities and duties of Commander in Chief. * * * He commands the Army and the Navy. Congress does not. He may make all disposition of troops and officers, stationing them now at this post, now at that; he may send our naval vessels to such parts of the world as he pleases; he may distribute the arms, ammunition, and supplies in such quantities and at such arsenals and such depositories as he deems best.

I am not speaking now, of course, of the question of a declaration of war. I am speaking of the execution of a treaty, of that which has been made the supreme law of the land, which creates, or tends to create, an obligation that we will discharge certain functions in the way of police power then that we do not have to discharge now. If the council or the asembly should determine—not authorize; I do not claim that they have the power to authorize—that, in order to preserve peace, 500,000 men shou'd be sent to a certain portion of the Far East, and that determination should seem wise to the Chief Executive, that judgment should commend itself to the Chief Executive, and the Chief Executive should conclude, not because they had the power to authorize him to do it—that is reserved; I will admit that it is advisory—but because he thought it was in the execution of both the letter and the spirit of the treaty to preserve the peace of that part of the world that he should send the troops to that part of the world and an impeachment proceeding was laid against him, would not the treaty be a perfect defense to it? Could you impeach the President of the United States—and that is the only way we could reach him—for obeying the advice of a council which we have created, and where we have a member, and a council whose advice, while not legally obligatory, is supposed to be given for the purpose of enlightening and instructing as to our duty? Could we impeach a President for executing the treaty under their advice?

We have sent the Navy, as has been suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], to foreign seas and to foreign lands for the purpose of protecting the rights of our citizens and the property interests which our citizens might have. Is that any higher obligation or any higher right than the obligation which will rest upon us under this treaty to execute it in accordance with its letter or its spirit?

I should like to know if anyone has thought out the process. Suppose the President did see fit to send troops to a foreign country under the treaty, how would Congress reach it and what would Congress do about it?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; in just a moment. Could they pass an act of Congress canceling the order, and thereby take command of the troops? Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator appreciates the fact that the sending of troops abroad involves a vast expense. Does the Senator think the President of the United States could augment the Army or increase the Navy or incur millions or hundreds of millions of dollars of expense for the Government thereafter to pay without any authority of law without subjecting himself to impeachment proceedings?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I said a moment ago that we could refuse to raise the army, and we could refuse to make appropriations for supplies. We have that defense. We could always place the Commander in Chief in a position where he could not do anything, because he would have nothing to do with. I agree with that. But if we put through the bill for the reorganization of the Army which is now pending before Congress, he will have sufficient to send. We will always have a large Navy and we will always have plenty of appropriations. Those things will have to be provided for to take care of the situation at home. If the President, however, sees fit in the execution of the treaty to use them otherwise, I do not think it is an impeachable offense at all.

Suppose we had a treaty with a South American country by which we guaranteed the independence of one of the Central American countries, and the President should see fit to send troops to that particular country for the purpose of preserving peace. Would there be any possible doubt but what he would have a right to do it? Mr. President, for over eight years the marines of the United States have been camping in the white house at Managua, Nicaragua. For eight years our armed forces have sustained by their presence the present government of Nicaragua. When did Congress authorize it, and how are we going to help ourselves? If those United States marines would leave the capital of Nicaragua to-night, the President of Nicaragua would leave it to-morrow morning, because it is an established fact, as nearly as such a thing can be established, because it is established by a report of our own Navy, that over 80 per cent of the inhabitants of Nicaragua are opposed to the government which we are sustaining. If we have a treaty which binds us to preserve the peace of any nation in Europe, or which obligates us to act under a moral obligation, at least, in accordance with the advice of the council or assembly, would not the President have just as much right to send troops to Silesia or to Serbia or to the Balkans or to Greece as he has to send them to Nicaragua? Indeed, he would have a far greater right. I do not think we have any right to do what we are doing in Nicaragua. But if behind what we are doing in Nicaragua there was a treaty to preserve the peace of that country, the Commander in Chief would have the undoubted right to do what we are doing now.

So I say, Mr. President, that this treaty creates an obligation upon the part of the United States, assuming all the time that we have the power to make it, which I do not concede. Assuming that this league of nations is a thing that we can create, and that we can enter into the obligation, then the obligation having been entered into, the Commander in Chief can utilize the troops and the Navy on the hither side of a declaration of war, the same as he can with reference to the boundaries of his own country.

Of course, Mr. President, this has no reference to any particular President. All Presidents have taken some pride in sending the Navy and the troops around hither and thither, and have sometimes accomplished good things by it.

I read another quotation, Mr. President, from Pomeroy:

The language of this clause should be carefully observed. Congress may make rules the object of which shall be regulation and government. It can not utter exceptional or transitory mandates which affect the management and disposition of the Army or Navy. This particular grant of power confers no power upon the legislature to usurp the functions of the Commander in Chief.

Pomeroy is referring to that provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to raise an Army, to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces, and so forth. The same authority, speaking particularly of an act of Congress which required that the general should have his permanent headquarters at Washington, said:

It seems to restrict the President in the exercise of his functions as Commander in Chief; it prevents him from assigning the general to such place and position as he deems expedient; and so far it interferes with his power to dispose of those forces. If Congress may do it in respect of one officer high in rank, it may do this to all officers and private soldiers and may thus assume to itself the entire attributes of the Commander in Chief.

The Supreme Court of the United States has said:

Congress has the power not only to raise and support and govern armies but to declare war. It has therefore the power to provide for carrying on war. This power necessarily extends to all legislation essential to the prosecution of war with vigor and success, except such as interferes with the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns. That power and duty belongs to the President as Commander in Chief.

Bear in mind all the time that we are not discussing those things which result in a declaration of war. We are not discussing those things which relate to the carrying on of war. We are not discussing the things which are at all relative to the power of Congress to declare war. We are discussing the obligation of the Chief Executive to execute the supreme law of the land, and to execute the treaty which we have made, not for purposes of war, but for purposes of peace, for the purpose of policing a situation.

I should like to know, if the President is not going to execute the Executive functions under the treaty, who is? And the Executive functions will operate with reference to these clauses at all times until you reach the point where you have a declaration of war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho understands, of course, that I am just as much opposed to article 10 as he can possibly be, and that I would like to see it eliminated entirely from the treaty. But it seems unlikely that it will be eliminated, and I want to make it as harmless as possible. I find myself unable to agree entirely with the reasoning of the Senator from Idaho in regard to the reservation which has been recommended by the committee, and I want to ask him a question or two in regard to it.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. I will be glad to answer the Senator, if I can.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho will agree, I think, that as the law now is and as the Constitution now is the President of the United States could not take our Army or any part of it to Europe merely for the purpose of settling a disturbance which had arisen on that continent.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming that no property rights or rights of American citizens were involved, I agree.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am assuming that the President proposes to take the Army there, not for the protection of American rights but for the purpose of restoring order and maintaining peace in any part of that continent. The Senator agrees with me about that.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question in order that we may come to an understanding as we go along? Suppose the President did it, however; what would be our remedy?

Mr. CUMMINS. Our remedy, of course, would be impeachment. There is no other remedy against the President of the United States, so far as I know.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. He would be violating the law of his own country and the Constitution of his own country if he were to do the thing which I have suggested. That we agree upon.

The Senator from Idaho contends that if we enter into this treaty we thereby make it lawful for the President to take our Army into any part of the world in order to preserve the peace, and I agree with him respecting that proposition if there be no reservations or modifications adopted. I call his attention to the very part of the reservation which he has said heretofore, and which the Senator from Montana very vigorously contends, should be eliminated as valueless, and as being in opposition to our Constitution and to the rights of the Commander in Chief under the Constitution.

The reservation declares that without the authority of Congress the President can not take our Army into any part of the world for the purpose of executing the treaty or any part of the treaty. I look upon that as very important and entirely within the authority of Congress. The Senator from Idaho has just stated that the President, without the authority of Congress, could not, by virtue of his position as Commander in Chief, take our Army to other parts of the world in order to preserve the peace. If he can not do that without the authority of Congress, it is very vital, it seems to me, that we should retain in the reservation a provision which shall take away from the treaty the obligation which undoubtedly it now contains and which would make it lawful for the President to use the Army for the purpose of maintaining peace in the world. I can not think that it would be wise to eliminate that provision, for if that were done it would have just the effect, which the Senator from Idaho so clearly states, of making it lawful for the President to use the troops of the United States or the Navy of the United States anywhere in the world simply to maintain peace and order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has not said that this particular clause to which I am now referring, "employ the naval or military forces of the United States under the treaty for any purpose," should be stricken out. I presume it would have some moral effect, but what I say is, and I want to make my position clear if I can, that when we create certain Executive functions or obligations under the treaty, when we execute a treaty which, if we have the right to execute it, devolves upon the President certain obligations as the Executive, that we can not draw back to Congress an Executive power and retain it to Congress as a legislative power. That which pertains to Executive action under the treaty must be performed by the Executive.

In other words, if we would undertake here and now to make a treaty by which we would limit the power of the President to command the Army and Navy within the United States, we could not do it. By this treaty we create certain obligations which I say are executive in their nature. The discharge of those obligations belongs to the Executive, and we, having created them and made them Executive obligations, can not retain them to ourselves as a legislative body and execute functions as a legislative body.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator indicate what kind of an Executive obligation would still rest upon the President of the United States with the adoption of this reservation?

Mr. BORAH. I will come to that in just a moment, if I can get to it. I yield now to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. As the reservation reads, the United States assumes no obligation to employ the military or naval forces under any treaty for any purpose unless in any particular case the Congress shall by act or joint resolution so provide. If that is adopted, does it not take away any obligation under which the President could act under the treaty?

Mr. BORAH. No. I have just said that in my opinion it does not, for the reason that the obligations which we create are not legislative obligations. They are Executive obligations, and I will come to them in a few moments and try to demonstrate what they are; and, being Executive obligations, we can not reserve them to a legislative body to be used by the legislative body alone. In other words, if we create a tribunal which is a judicial tribunal, it may exercise the functions of a judicial tribunal, and we can not draw to ourselves the right to exercise the judicial functions of that tribunal or any part of them.

Mr. KELLOGG. But the obligations in the treaty, if there are any, are treaty obligations, and this says that there shall be no obligation to use the military or naval forces without the consent of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Congress can not have anything to do with it unless it involves a declaration of war, because the Constitution of the United States does not permit Congress to control the Army and Navy except in the case of a declaration of war. You have to take this position. It may be a logical position—I do not say that it is not—to say that the troops are prohibited from being sent abroad at all under any circumstances, and that the treaty in its other obligations, either express or implied, is void as to that obligation; but if the troops must go abroad at all, under the treaty they can go abroad under the direction of the Commander in Chief if it does not involve a case of war.

Mr. KELLOGG. But in that case the President would not have authority under the treaty at all, because the obligation has been taken away.

Mr. BORAH. But other functions which exist under the treaty have not been taken away. That is what I am complaining about. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I attempted to follow the position of the Senator and determine the orderly sequence and the conclusion at which he would arrive. As I understand the Senator's position it is that the treaty, if entered into, would authorize the President under article 10 to use the Army or the Navy of the United States to repel the aggression of any signatory to the treaty upon some other signatory to the treaty. That act, if done, would be an act of war, and yet the treaty would authorize it notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States declares that Congress alone has the power to declare war. Does not the Senator think that that declaration of the Constitution would limit the action of the President, and conceding that he might send the troops abroad, he could not engage in any act that would be an act of war without direct authorization of Congress?

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator. I have said several times that if the act of the President involved the carrying on of war, of course he should have the authority of Congress. But I am speaking of that multitude of things which the President may do with the Army or Navy with reference to preserving peace and policing the situation for the purpose of preventing war.

Let us now take article 11, which has not been touched, and which no one seems to want to touch. To my mind it is altogether the most dangerous provision in the treaty. Article 10 has this virtue, that it is at least specific. It does fix a standard, to wit, the standard of external aggression and of territorial integrity and political independence. So it has the virtue of having some specific standard by which and under which we can fix our obligations. I agree that it is an entirely objectionable standard, but it has the virtue of definiteness in that respect.

But article 11 says that:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

"Any action" includes military action. "Any action" includes economic blockade. "Any action" includes the sending of the Navy wherever it may preserve peace. Not the Congress of the United States, but the league, functioning through its bodies, to wit, the council and the assembly, shall—not may, but shall—take any action that it may deem wise for the purpose of protecting the peace of the world.

It is a significant fact, Mr. President, that article 11, as it originally read, said:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the high contracting parties reserve the right to take any action that may be deemed wise.

But in the reconsideration of this, when they came to the question of unanimous consent in the council, they then transferred the reserved right back and made it obligatory, so that every man who sits in that league sits under a command to take such action as the council may suggest with reference to preserving the peace of the world.

The league must operate through it bodies, either the council or the assembly. Let us assume that a war or threat of war has arisen which affects the members of the league or affects nations somewhere upon this mundane sphere, because it need not be necessarily a member of the league—"it is hereby declared to be a matter of concern"—and the council or the assembly take action, as they are not only authorized but commanded to do, and they decide that the five great nations of the earth shall send 100,000 troops each to a certain part of the world, not for the purpose of war but to prevent war, not for purpose of conflict but to prevent conflict. Is the President of the United States bound to respect the advice of the council of the league, or if he is not bound to do it, if he feels under moral obligation to do it and does do it, what remedy has the Congress of the United States if he sends 100,000 men?

You would say at once that we had put into another portion of this covenant a provision to the effect that the troops shall not be sent without the authority of Congress. The President would reply to you at once: "Whether I shall send troops to preserve the peace of the world under this league is an Executive function and belongs to me under the Constitution, and you can not take it away from me by an act of Congress."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. How could the President urge a constitutional right to send troops anywhere if in the particular case the Constitution did not authorize it?

Mr. BORAH. It authorizes it, because you have created here an Executive obligation under article 11 by making a treaty. You have made a treaty under article 11, and if anybody can send them, if we have any power to make such a treaty, and if the troops can be sent at all, the President can send them for the purpose of peace and for policing, but if we want to send them for war, I grant that the Congress of the United States must act.

Mr. LENROOT. But this reservation relieves us of that very obligation and leaves the President exactly where he would be if there were no treaty at all.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend, then, that the reservation has the same effect upon article 11 as it has upon article 10?

Mr. LENROOT. From my construction, no; but from the Senator's construction, yes. If article 10 creates any obligation, the reservation relieves us of the obligation.

Mr. BORAH. Well, the Senator is a very adroit logician, for he saves himself and condemns me at the same time.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator understands that I do not construe article 11 as he does; I do not admit that article 11 permits the imposition of any kind of an obligation; I contend that article 11 is only advisory in character, while the Senator from Idaho construes article 11 as giving to the league the authority to impose an obligation, which I do not admit.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Wisconsin will be successful in contending that article 11 is merely advisory. I do not know how you would create an obligation and make it commanding in language any other than the language which is used in article 11, for it says:

> * * * is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise.

Mr. President, of course there is one way to look at this matter, and I like sometimes, when I think of the fact that this league is liable to go through, anyway, to look at it in that way, and that is that the whole thing is a sophomore's dream; that it will never be executed or any part of it; that there is no legal obligation; that there is no moral obligation and nothing else to make us pay any attention to it; but while, as I say, I sometimes like to entertain that idea, I am afraid of it.

Now, let us look at the other clause of article 11.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment.

That article reads:

> It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

"Any circumstance." What is a circumstance and what may it not be? Why, a fight in the streets of New York between two individuals, foreigners, might be a circumstance which would cause international disturbance. A circumstance of any nature or kind which any friendly, active, vigilant soul may think would bring disturbance to the peace of the world may be brought to the attention of the league under article 11, and when it is brought to the attention of the league, then the article says that "any war or threat of war" shall be of concern to the league and that they shall take such action as "may be deemed wise."

If these circumstances or conditions are brought to the attention of the league the league takes jurisdiction and decides through its council or assembly that certain action is essential to the peace of the world, and the President, as Chief Executive and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, without authority of Congress, sends a hundred thousand troops to foreign parts for the purpose of executing that provision of the treaty, is it not an Executive function and not a legislative function? If it is an Executive function it can not be reserved to the legislature by a clause of this treaty.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that reservation No. 3 takes care of article 11, to which he has referred, assuming the construction which he has given to it to be correct? It reads in this way:

> The United States assumes no obligation—

Then, leaving out the words "to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country," and so forth—to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose.

Does that not cover article 11, to which the Senator from Idaho has referred?

Mr. BORAH. If it were impossible to construe the two together, I presume the ordinary rule of construction would apply, and where there was absolute conflict it would annul article 11; it would abrogate and destroy article 11 in so far as any action at all was concerned with reference to troops or the Navy.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes. Does the Senator think that reservation No. 3 can really be construed in any other way?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think it can. I have been trying to demonstrate how it could be.

Now, another thing. The able Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] this morning delivered a very powerful argument, as he always does when he discusses legal propositions, as to the question of whether this or that could be considered within the jurisdiction of the council or the league under article 10 or article 11. If the Senator from Montana were presenting his view of the matter to a judicial tribunal which would have power to exercise a check upon the action of the council of the league or the assembly of the league, I think his argument would be practically unanswerable; but the difficulty is we are creating a political body with quasi judicial, executive, and legislative functions, but with no power to revise or review or reverse their action. The able Senator would never have a chance to argue the question if he should conclude that the league covenant had been improperly construed. There is no tribunal before which the matter could be brought and the action of the council could be reviewed.

Some one will construe this covenant from time to time; some one will sit in judgment upon its terms; and those men will be exercising powers which no one else can review. When we take into consideration the fact that we, as the Senate of the United States, have sat here for the last two years, and although restrained by a fundamental law have been passing statutes and acts with reference to the war which might be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and yet passing statutes and acts which a vast number of people felt were utterly outside of the Constitution, what will a single council sitting behind closed doors in Geneva do in the construction of an article when necessity or exigency calls for a construction? There is only one reviewing power, and that is for the separate nations simply to disregard the matter, and thereby practically break up and destroy the league. We will not do that. If we were called upon to act when there was not an exigency at hand or when a great emergency was not at hand, we might refuse to act, but when they construe the power under article 11 to authorize them to require a certain number of troops in a portion of the world for the purpose of preserving peace and the exigency is on, the Congress of the United States, pursuing the precedents which it has established not only in this war but in others, will yield to it. That is one of the great vices of this league. We are creating a supergovernment, as it were; creating a constitution and a covenant which some one must construe, and no one can construe it except those who are going to exercise the power. That constitutes the very acme of tyranny—to place power in the hands of a few men with no power above them to check their action.

Mr. President, I do not desire to pursue this further——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the Senator concludes I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. Before I conclude I wish to add a few words regarding another matter. Leaving article 11 for a moment and going back to article 3, that article provides:

The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

Then article 4 provides:

The council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

The council or the assembly, one or both, acting under article 11 reach their decision; the President of the United States accepts that decision and conforms his act to it by sending troops to any point which the assembly may think it is proper to send them; and we have no defense and no remedy. I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the point to which I intended to direct the attention of the Senator may not be so appropriately made now as at the time I sought to interrupt him, but nevertheless I will suggest it.

Article 10 provides that—

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of all members of the league.

Under article 11—

Any war or threat of war * * * is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise.

I read an address by a distinguished gentleman in New York Saturday night upon the reservation, and in discussing article 10, if I understood him correctly, he maintained that it did not cast the burden upon the members of the league to maintain the territorial integrity or existing political independence of the members, but cast that burden upon the league and that it was to be exercised by the league upon the advice of the council. I wanted to ask the Senator whether he agreed with that view, or whether he does not think that there is a liability upon each member of the league under article 10, as well as upon the league itself?

Mr. BORAH. I think under article 10 that if a condition should arise calling for action under it, and Jugo-Slavia or Poland or some other nation or half a dozen other nations were to drop out, the obligation would still rest upon us as a member of the league to perform our duty under that obligation, regardless of whether or not we had the assistance of those other powers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I made the suggestion with this in view, that inasmuch as the Senator takes the position that whatever obligation we assume under this treaty is to be carried out by the President, if it involves the use of military power, it would tend to reinforce the Senator's argument that the President, without the consent of Congress at all, would have a right under the treaty to move military and naval forces to perform our obligations under article 10.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think there is much in that suggestion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I simply rise to offer and have read a reservation which I intend to propose after the other reservations are disposed of. I think it may be contended by some that the matter sought to be covered by the reservation which I intend to propose is covered by reservations already suggested, but apparently there is quite a difference of opinion as to what the effect of these reservations will be and as to what they mean, just as there is a difference of opinion with reference to the meaning of the covenant of the league of nations. There is one thing, however, which I want made clear, and which I think the people of the country would like to have made clear, and that is that we shall not be bound, either morally or legally, to send our troops abroad unless Congress orders or authorizes such action. I do not want our member of the council to be left free to give his consent in the council, thereby making it unanimous, to any proposal that would involve the sending of our troops abroad without the consent of Congress. So when the other reservations are disposed of I am going to offer this reservation which I think will make that matter clear. I ask that the proposed reservation be read, and that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The proposed reservation of Mr. JONES of Washington was read, and ordered to be printed and lie on the table, as follows:

The representative of the United States on the council of the league of nations shall not give his consent to any proposal under any provisions of the covenant of the league of nations which may involve the use of the military or naval forces of the United States until such proposal shall be submitted to the Congress and the Congress shall authorize him to give his consent thereto.

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I direct its attention for a very few moments to another subject, and one which seems to me to be of great immediate importance.

In the statement issued by the American Federation of Labor, and published in all of the morning papers throughout the country, I find this language:

Both the restraining order and the injunction, in so far as its prohibitory features are concerned, are predicated upon the Lever Act, a law enacted by Congress for the purpose of preventing speculation and profiteering of the food and fuel supplies of the country. There never was in the minds of the Congress in enacting that law, or in the mind of the President when he signed it, that the Lever Act would be applied to workers in cases of strikes or lockouts. The food controller, Mr. Hoover, specifically so stated.

Members of the committee having the bill in charge have in writing declared that it was not in the minds of the committee, and the then Attorney General, Mr. Gregory, gave assurance that the Government would not apply that law to the workers' efforts to obtain improved working conditions. Every assurance from the highest authority of our Government was given that the law would not be so applied.

A similar statement appears in the report of the American Federation of Labor executive council bearing date of November 12, 1917. On pages 74 and 75 I find this statement referring to the Lever bill:

The Federation gave its full support to the principles involved in this legislation, but suggested that the provision which said: "That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; to restrict the supply of any necessaries; to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof, shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $10,000, or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both," be added to by the incorporation of an amendment declaring that the intent of this section was not to repeal any of the labor provisions of the Clayton law. It was feared that the language in this section might be construed to make it unlawful for workmen engaged in food transportation and production to strike.

An amendment was introduced for the purpose of safeguarding labor's interests in accordance with the above suggestion, and while Mr. Hoover stated that the section was not intended to prevent workmen from ceasing work, yet acquiesced in the amendment proposed and rendered valuable assistance in an effort to secure its adoption. Upon our failure to secure the adoption of this amendment, the matter was taken up through the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense. The Attorney General concurred in the view that the section was not intended to restrict the right of workmen to strike. As a further precaution, an arrengement was made whereby the Attorney General was to communicate with all of the attorneys representing the Government, informing them of his opinion and directing that no action be instituted against workmen engaged in the industries referred to for ceasing to perform labor.

During the period that the food-control bill was being considered by the administration, the United States Supreme Court rendered its decision in the case of the Paine Lumber Co. v. United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, in which the court decided that the conspiracy clauses of the Sherman law could not be made operative by a private party suing for an injunction against another private party or by one corporation against another corporation. The remedy for such a person or corporation is to apply to the Attorney General of the United States and have him institute a suit for injunction or restraining order.

That part of the announcement which I have just read from the statement appearing in the morning press is a very important one, indeed, and I am informed by what I consider to be credible authority that the facts are not precisely as stated in that document. Of course, what we desire and what we must have in any consideration of the present critical situation throughout the country is accurate information as to details, and particularly with regard to the action of the Government which culminated in the injunction which is now the cause of so much excitement.

Turning back to the time when the Lever bill was considered by the Senate, I am unable upon a very superficial examination of the debates to speak with absolute certainty as to the attitude of the members of the conference committee and of the Senate upon the subject. The Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Hollis, who then occupied a seat upon the floor of this body, seems to have been in charge of the amendment to which the American Federation of Labor refers in its report of that year, and took an active part in the discussion of the subject upon the 6th, 7th, and 8th days of August.

On page 5828 of volume 55, part 6, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-fifth Congress, Senator Hollis is reported as having said:

It would not be strange if the next movement were found in the United States, and I wish to warn those Members of the Senate who take this matter lightly that if it is found in the United States it will be on their heads, and that this bill will be the strike bowider that the Senate is tossing into the bowels of organized labor in this country. I fancy there are very few Senators who appreciate what is contained in this bill on this point.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] then interrupted the Speaker by asking this question:

May I ask the Senator if there has been any statement made by anyone as to why this was taken out of the bill?

That is, the proposed amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not know whether the statement made to me was confidential or not. I think I can fairly treat it as not confidential. I was told that only two Members of the Senate conferees voted to sustain this amendment. I then said, "Do they believe that it does not prevent peaceful strikes?" The reply was, "Oh, yes; they believe that it prevents peaceful strikes, but they think that peaceful strikes should be prevented during the war." That was the report as it came to me.

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings under the conference report, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] took a very prominent part; and on the same day, reading from page 5837, the Senator from Oregon used this language:

Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire—for whom I entertain the very highest regard, both as to his ability and as to his sincerity—that I do not believe it will do any good to refer this bill back to the conferees. I am frank to say that I never heard anyone say that this amendment was stricken from the bill in conference in order that strikes might be prohibited, if need be, during the time of this war.

In the discussion which followed the Senator from New Hampshire said:

If the Senator will permit me very briefly, the argument of the able Senator from Oregon does not meet the case at all. The provision of the food bill to which I have adverted makes it a distinct criminal offense for two of the officials of a labor union to arrange with each other to call a strike. If the officials of a labor union can not call a strike, a strike can not be effectively put into force. The provisions of the Clayton Act allow the ordinary procedures of labor unions to be carried out without the participants being held to violate the law. Therefore, if the amendment stays out of this bill, strikes will be effectively prohibited in the classes of industries that come under the purview of the bill.

The conference report was adopted on the 8th day of August, with only 7 votes in the negative. These were Senators FRANCE, GRONNA, HARDWICK, HOLLIS, LA FOLLETTE, PENROSE, and REED.

The total yeas were 66.

It would therefore appear, Mr. President, from a superficial examination of the debate which occurred when the conference report was considered, that the Senator having charge of the proposed amendment was of the opinion that it was necessary, otherwise injunctions might be issued prohibiting what were called peaceful strikes during time of war; and there is therefore at least an open question regarding the extent to which the Senate is said to have committed itself to the opposite view of the bill at the time its consequences were being considered. But if it be true that the Attorney General of the United States gave the assurance which this statement gives broadcast to the country, we should know it officially; and if there is any mistake about it, then it is all the more important that we should know it.

Therefore, since my attention was called to this subject I have very hastily drawn this resolution:

Whereas the American Federation of Labor, in a statement this day published throughout the country, and directed to the recent judicial order of the United States district court for the district of Indiana against the officers of the United Mine Workers of America, makes this statement—

And then I quote the statement which I have previously read—

Be it resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be requested to supply the Senate with copies of all statements and correspondence in the files of the Department of Justice relating to the above declaration of the American Federation of Labor, whether addressed to the officials of said organization or otherwise.

Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the proceedings upon the consideration of the treaty, but I regard this subject as of pressing and prime importance, and I shall therefore ask unanimous consent, as in legislative session, for the immediate consideration of this resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Supposing that the former Attorney General makes a statement, of the character attributed to him, to some person, or to some representative of the unions, after the law was passed, does the Senator contend that that would be binding upon the President or should influence him?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not. Neither do I contend, if it was made officially, that it would be binding; it would be his opinion. But I think it important that we should have whatever information we can get from the Department of Justice upon that particular subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator state why he thinks it is important? Regardless of a former expression by the Department of Justice, the present Department of Justice is properly enforcing the law.

Mr. THOMAS. I make no question about that, Mr. President; but I do think that we should have the facts with regard to the recitals of the statement from which I have read, because if there is no foundation, or only a partial foundation, for them, the moral effect of that statement will be to that extent weakened. If it is a fact, then, Mr. President, while it would not in any manner absolve the Attorney General from the enforcement of the law, and would not in any manner be binding upon the present incumbent of that office, we might be able to ascertain the basis of it, and for our own information I think it is desirable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if he does not think really that that is a matter which the Department of Justice itself should take care of rather than to be handled by us? I do not suppose the Senator contemplates any immediate additional legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not know what the situation may evolve with regard to immediate legislation. That depends entirely upon the events of the next few days. I have introduced this resolution as a precautionary measure, in order that we may have some information that may or may not be useful in the event an emergency presents itself which would require congressional action. Of course, if there is objection to the resolution I shall not attempt to press it at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it would be better to have it go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the reservation presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on behalf of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado has offered, as a substitute for the third reservation submitted by the committee, a reservation which was introduced by me at the very beginning of the consideration of this treaty. The reservation which is now offered as a substitute is a reservation which had the indorsement of a number of Senators on this side of the Chamber. It represented our views at that time. Probably it represents our views at the present time better than the reservation which was adopted by the committee. But we received no encouragement from the other side of the Chamber upon the reservation which was then introduced, and being a minority upon this side of the Chamber with respect to the views expressed in that reservation, a number of those who agreed with me upon the one which has been offered as a substitute were very desirous that we should come to some kind of an arrangement, fearing that unless there should be an agreement there would be adopted a reservation which would be far more radical than the one we now have before us.

We attempted during a period, I think, of about two months, to secure a reservation that would be more in harmony with my views and with the views of one or two other Senators. We were unable to do that, and thereupon we did agree upon the amendment which has been introduced by the committee, or at least I will say for myself that I agreed to that amendment, and having agreed to it, I could not properly revert to the amendment which I offered at that time, and I feel myself in honor bound to support the committee reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I listened with keen interest to the very able argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in answer to a portion of an address which I made upon the covenant of the league of nations over a month ago. I have very high regard and great respect for the ability and honorable and high motives of the Senator from Montana. I do not think there is any Senator on this floor that I esteem more highly. He would be the last of all Senators in this body to whom I would indirectly impute a motive other than the highest.

If I correctly gathered the words of his address, he said, in substance, "If the Senator from Massachusetts had approached the subject with unprejudiced mind and with a sympathetic predilection he might have reached different conclusions." I think that statement justifies me, at least, in explaining just what processes of mental reasoning I went through before I took the position I have toward this covenant.

Let me say, first of all, that I took very great care in the speech which I made here to not even refer to the statement in the argument made by the able Senator from Montana which differed very, very strongly with the views that I entertained, namely, that under article 11 of this covenant it is possible for hearings to be given to subject races.

I took occasion also not to refer to or to answer the very able and interesting argument, one to which much weight might be given, made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] in regard to rights of subject nations under article 10. I was not concerned so much about what interpretation other Senators put upon these articles as I was to be able to make plain to the people of America any statement which I might make as to the rights of subject peoples under these articles.

It was not easy for me to disagree with my associates. I approached this question of a league of nations with great sympathy, with exceedingly great sympathy. I am a believer in a league of nations. I expect to vote for a covenant for a league of nations, and I have never taken a contrary position from the beginning of this discussion to the end. I had every reason to look on it with sympathetic attitude. I entertained the very highest regard and esteem for the man who represented our Republic at the peace conference. I have supported him in every political campaign. I have been in hearty sympathy with his views and opinions. I have paid tribute to him again and again, and I now declare that I think he is the greatest political leader, with the most progressive and forward-looking thought and political program upon public questions of our time. I well knew what would happen by taking an attitude contrary to the opinion of the administration. I was led to assume that I would receive in due time my punishment, and I now know that it is purposed by some to take from me all political patronage that a Democratic Senator might have in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I am prepared for that sacrifice. I am prepared for misjudgment of motives. But I know now more than ever that I was right, especially since I have not heard one Senator on this floor justify the Shantung provision of this covenant; when I have not heard one Senator on this side of the Chamber, if I recall it correctly, make a speech in justification of the inequalities of this treaty which give in the league six representatives to Great Britain and one to the United States.

There are three ways in which a Senator might approach this subject: With a sympathetic attitude, yes, and with a determination, whether right or wrong, to support this covenant of the league of nations.

Another attitude is to approach it with a determination to find fault with it, to criticize it, to belittle the spokesmen, the leaders, and the advocates of it because of what political advantage it might give.

There is a third way, that of trying to find what is good in it, of believing in the fundamental principle of a league of nations, of supporting and sustaining that principle, of being willing to vote for it, of believing that it is the greatest blessing that could come to the human race, of acknowledging that in this covenant are many provisions of value and of benefit to the human race, and yet being able to find some things in this covenant that may work out an injustice. I ask, Is it wrong to raise your voice in this Chamber, on either side, in differences with your associates or your political leaders, in protesting against an international wrong and the inequalities and un-American ideals it contains? Is it wrong to try to Americanize this covenant?

If I believed, as I do believe, that the subject races of Europe are debarred from a hearing under article 11 of this covenant, because it is a domestic question, I ask you what your opinion would be of me, honestly believing that, if I sat here, an offspring from people of a subject race, and did not cry out in protest against the declaration made all over this country that under article 11 there was provision made for hearings of the differences between subject races and their oppressors?

I have tried to approach this subject in a sympathetic attitude. I have protested against three features of this covenant. I have protested against Shantung; I have protested against article 10 and have said that it required a clear interpretation to properly safeguard American rights; and I have protested against the inequalities which exist in giving six representatives to Great Britain to one of our own.

I can not conceive how any American can justify that inequality. I can not conceive how any American can agree without protest to a covenant and agreement which provides that in any dispute between England and the United States, England must withdraw from the council, the United States must withdraw from the council; but on the jury in the assembly to hear and settle that dispute Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India still remain.

I shall say no more. I would not have said what I have except that I felt, although I think the Senator from Montana may not have intended to be interpreted the way that I have interpreted his words, that in justification to myself I should say that I intend to continue to protest against those features of the covenant of the league of nations which I, as an American citizen, believe may work injury and injustice to America.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope I do not misquote the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. If I took down his language correctly it was literally this: "I stand here as the offspring of a subject race."

The Senator ought to stand here as a Senator of the United States. He ought to stand everywhere in the United States as an American citizen, in that single capacity and in no dual capacity. He ought to stand here as an American Senator regardless of all questions of love or hatred existent now or hitherto in Europe. But he announces himself that he stands here in his capacity as an ambassador from a sovereign American State, not as a representative of American interests, not as a representative of America, but as "the offspring of a subject race." If every Jew in America stood in America simply as a Jew, and God knows the Jewish race has been oppressed enough; if every Jugo-Slav stood here in his European capacity, if every Hungarian stood here in that capacity, and if every German and every Austrian stood here in that capacity instead of standing simply and purely and solely as Americans, we would have of what are known as hyphenates some 10,000,000 or 20,000,000 of Irish-Americans, another 20,000,000 German-Americans, another 20,000,000 of Slovak-Americans, and some 30,000,000 of some other sort of Americans, reducing the real plain "Americans only" not only to a minority, but to a minor quantity.

We would not be a Nation homogeneous and of one history, aim, and policy as fellow nationals, but as a potpourri of indigestible ingredients.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I used the expression in connection with a statement that had been made that subject races had a right to a hearing under the provisions of article 11.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, I care not in what connection the Senator used the words. The devil discloses his cloven foot, whatever his pretense of quoting Scripture may be. But the Senator's language was, "I stand here as the offspring of subject races."

If every man derived from Wales, every man derived from Scotland, every man derived from England, every man derived from Ireland, every man derived from Germany, every man derived from Hungary, from Slovakia, or Russia, stood here representing his European derivation instead of his American adoption, we would have, as I said a moment ago, a potpourri, not a population of homogeneous people seeking a common purpose, with common ideals or common traditions, but a miserable melting pot of elements still unmelted and unmeltable, of whom the Senator from Massachusetts would be one by his own confession, or, what is still worse, by his own proud assertion.

What would you think of me if I stood here contending, because two strains in my blood were Welsh, that I stood in America for Welsh interests in Europe, or because one strain was English that I stood in America for English interests here and in Europe, or because one strain was lowland Scotch that I stood for lowland Scotch interests in Europe and America, or because one strain was highland Scotch I stood for highland Scotch interests as much as or more than American. They are European interests—all these—let them stew in their own European juices.

Ah, what does it all mean? There is not a word in this covenant that binds any American citizen at any time—and the Senator from Massachusetts knows it provided he has average intelligence—to take part at any time with Great Britain against Ireland in any domestic controversy that may be cultivated between them across the water.

What he as a Senator of the United States is seeking—or perhaps I am going too far in that, but what the Sinn Fein Irish are seeking is that we shall under no circumstances be too friendly to Great Britain, because if we are friendly to Great Britain it may avoid a possibly expected war between her and us at some time by which the Irish would profit.

All the Germans who tried to use America in order to help the fatherland were despicable because they came to us as a place of rest and profit making, and then proved traitors to the roof that sheltered them, but they had at least the excuse of loving the fatherland. Love even of the wrong thing excuses much. The men now that want to terminate the league of nations and defeat it, whether by bludgeoning it on the head or by poisoning it with reservations, and it makes no difference which, not for the reason that they love some country beyond the Atlantic, but for the reason that they hate some country beyond the Atlantic—England, for example—are much less meritorious. Hatred is never a noble motive.

"The offspring of subject races." Who in the mischief could not stand in the American Senate, if he chose to cast aside his American adoption and his American citizenship, as "the offspring of a subject race"? A Hungarian could do it, a Jugo-Slav could do it, a Pole could do it; even a Welshman 300 years arrived, or 250 years rather, as I am, could do it; the Puritans that landed at Plymouth Rock, English though they were, but thrown out by persecution, could do it. All left something hateful, if not oppressive, in Europe. But they should not use their American citizenship to serve their European hatreds.

I say to you, Mr. President, that the man who pretends to be an American citizen, even a private citizen, much less an American Senator, the man who claims the rights of American citizenship and the benefits of it, must throw behind him "without mental reservation," without Jesuitical pretense of any description, all of his European derivation, whatever it was, Hungarian, Russian, Jew, Irish, I care not what; and if he is not ready to throw it behind him he is unworthy to be an American citizen and he is trebly unworthy to be an American Senator.

How can America work out its destiny if, every time an American question, in its connection with foreign relations, is raised, each man cries to himself, am I a Hun, am I Austrian, am I German, am I Jugo-Slav, am I Pole, am I Irish? The plain answer is that you are, if loyal, none of these—but simply American.

I read a speech here not long ago that was published in one of the newspapers purporting to be a speech of—I do not even remember who it was from, but from some fellow who said, "I am 100 per cent Irish and 100 per cent American." That is a self-evident lie. A man can not be 100 per cent Irishman and 100 per cent American. He can not be 100 per cent German and 100 per cent American. He can not even be 50 per cent of each. If he is 50 per cent of each, they cancel one another off and he is nothing, absolutely nothing.

I had of ancestors one who wore the British uniform in the fight against the French and Canadians. The same ancestor subsequently wore the uniform of a colonel of the colonial army under the Continental Congress against the British. I had an ancestor who fought against this American Union under the stars and bars. But, Mr. President, if I had been tied either to the first flag that the first ancestor fought for or to the last flag that the last ancestor fought for as a thing of present allegiance I would never have taken the oath at the chancel of the Senate.

You have got to be Irish or you have got to be American. You can not be 100 per cent of both and you can not be 50 per cent of both. You have got to be German or you have got to be American. You have got to be Swede or you have got to be American. You have to be Norwegian or else, like the old Viking over there from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], you have got to be completely an American. Every man who can take an oath of allegiance to the United States "without mental reservation" must mean what he says. It must be without mental reservation, and he must leave behind him his European derivation.

Mr. President, every now and then I hear some talk about the American language, the American people, and all that. Of course, as a matter of fact, going away back, the only real American is the red American Indian, but that does not mean that there are no Americans in the modern acceptation of the term. Racially the American is the red American Indian, and all of us are Europeans racially speaking. Whether we be Hungarians, Slavs, low Germans, high Germans, or Anglo-Saxons racially, we are racially Europeans as opposed to Africans and as opposed to red American Indians or Asiatics. But the term has secured another meaning. It means now to-day a man who is entirely and altogether and unreservedly dedicated and consecrated in his allegiance to the American Government and its destiny, its traditions, and its ideals.

Any man who tries to mix up his duty to the American people with any fancied duty to any European derivations, I care not what, is just to that degree false to American citizenship, false to American duty, and false to American obligations.

Mr. President, I wish I had by me something that I should like to read from Theodore Roosevelt. I have it in my office, but I have it not here. It was said while he was making a speech to Irish-Americans, and he was drawing the line of duty. No man was ever a better friend of the Irish-American, so called, than Theodore Roosevelt. I myself was never a better friend, and I have spoken for them and raised money for them and given my poor, weak voice in behalf of home rule in Ireland. The Senator from Massachusetts may not know it, and a great many of his hyphenates may not know it, but they have lost more friends for Ireland during this war than they have ever gained in any 20 years prior to it; and they have added to that loss by the conduct of many of them in attempts to act as a racial group concerning this league of nations.

There was man after man without a drop of Irish blood in his veins whose whole sympathy and soul went out for Irish home rule as mine did. I have sat upon the same platform with Cardinal Gibbons and with old Fred Talbott, of Maryland, while we were all trying to help the cause of Irish home rule. But, Mr. President, when I remember the American sailors who were rabbled in Cork; when I remember the information given to German submarines in order that they might sink English and neutral ships, perhaps with American women and children and property on board of them, and all given by the Sinn Fein; when I remember the agreement with Germany to land troops and rifles upon the coast of Ireland in order to fight against one of our allies, and thereby fight against us, I confess that the old, generous spirit of love for the genial, sociable, friendly Irishman fades to a certain extent, while I condemn the treachery and ill-concealed enmity of the Sinn Feiners.

I have been accused of having made a speech here on the floor not long ago in which it was said that "I attacked the whole Irish race." I did no such thing. I attacked that portion of the Irish who in Ireland were pro-German during the war and who were here in America allied, as the evidence in the Department of Justice shows in many cases, with German conspirators. I did not attack the Irish as a race. I attacked those of them who had asked for American citizenship and had not lived up to it; who behind American citizenship, who behind their native-born rights as such or behind their oath of allegiance as naturalized citizens, saw something else in Europe which in their opinion was of at least equal importance, and, judging by the conduct of some of them, of greater importance.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] tells us that he has always been fond of the President. Yes; he was; there is no doubt about that. When he was running for the Senatorship from Massachusetts he was awfully fond of the President. The Springfield Republican, a Massachusetts Republican newspaper, quoted a great many of his utterances upon that subject, all abounding in promises to support the policies of the President——

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. He was coming down to Washington——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will suspend.

Mr. OWEN. I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that he is imputing an improper motive to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not. I am imputing a very proper motive to him. The Senator from Massachusetts said he was always fond of the President, and I am just trying to prove it by his utterances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Just a second. Will the Senator from Mississippi suspend? The Senator from Mississippi has more than once approached more closely to the line of violation of the rule than he probably was conscious of during his speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, Mr. President, if I have transgressed the rule, then it is a part of the duty of the Chair to correct me and to call me to order; but the Chair has no right to indulge in a general academic reflection as to how closely I approximated the line. I know just how closely I am approximating, and that I am not transcending.

Mr. President, I have not imputed any motive to the Senator from Massachusetts except a motive that he himself boasted of. The Senator said that he was very fond of the President; that he had been devoted to him all the time; and I went on to prove it by his utterances while he was a candidate in Massachusetts for the United States Senate, during which candidacy he professed entire allegiance to the President and to the administration. I can not conceive how anyone could think that that imputed any improper motive unless the President was an improper subject of allegiance, which, in my opinion, is not quite true.

Mr. President, I want to say one word more. I have in my heart no racial hatred of any description. Just as soon as Germany stabilizes a democratic government of some sort of her own self-determination I doubt not that I shall be the first man in this body to rise and move that the American representatives in the league of nations shall advocate the admission of Germany as a member of the league of nations. If a revolt or revolution broke out in Ireland to-morrow against Great Britain, I would not raise one finger, even this little finger, of my hand to help Great Britain put the Irish down; and if the Irish could gain their independence and their freedom as my forefathers gained theirs, I would be the first man to give them a word of encouragement upon the line of their future progress and advancement.

But what I demand is this, and this only, that there shall be no class in America which shall regard the question of our foreign relations as a European racially derived question. I object to any race in America voting as a group instead of voting as Americans. I object to the Afro-Americans voting as a group simply because they are African derived; I object to German-Americans voting as a group simply because they are German derived; I object to Irish-Americans voting as a group simply because they are Irish derived; and, by the way, in my opinion, two-thirds of the men in America of ultimate Irish ancestry agree with me exactly about that, and the Sinn-Fein Irish before they are through with it will hear from the so-called Irish-Americans themselves. I mean by that real Americans who are of Irish derivation but who are Americans 100 per cent with a zero percentage anywhere else. I know a lot of them; a lot of them are down in Mississippi, in my native town; a lot of them are in Vicksburg; a lot of them in Natchez, a lot all around me and no better men God ever made, no braver and no truer; but they are Americans and they do not approve of any so-called American looking at a foreign relations question from a European standpoint no matter what the European standpoint is.

Offspring of subject races! Why, who in the mischief is there in America who is not the offspring of a subject race? If there be Indian blood in your veins, you are the offspring of a subject race; if there be Highland Scotch blood in your veins, as there is in mine, you are the offspring of a race subject at one time; if you have Hungarian blood in your veins, if there be any sort of blood in your veins at all, except Norwegian and Swedish, so far as I can now remember, you are the offspring of some race which at some time in Europe was a subject race. Even if you are an Italian by derivation, part of the Italians in Italia Irredenta were subject races of Austria; if you are a Rumanian, by European derivation, you are perhaps the offspring of some Rumanians in Transylvania or in Bessarabia subject to Austrian or to Russian tyranny; but after you land upon these shores—you, or your father, or your grandfather, or your great-grandfather—then you ought to become an American, and you ought to forget Europe.

I said "forget Europe," Mr. President. I did not mean that; you should remember to do your part as God insisted that Cain should do his part in the Garden of Eden, and that you are to a certain extent your brother's keeper, but you should forget to use your citizenship to serve particular European interests and you must remember that while you are attending to the work as your brother's keeper abroad or here, you are attending to it solely as an American citizen and, if you are part of the Government, as an American President or Senator or Representative in Congress.

I have heard a great deal, Mr. President, about who gained this late war. The Belgians say they gained it, because they kept the German horde back two or three weeks; and there is reason in what they say; the Frenchman says he gained it, because he furnished the real resistance until the British could get over, and there is reason in what he says; the British say that they gained it, because of their fleet and because of the fact that when they did get over they got over with good guns and with good courage, and there is much in what they say; we contend that we gained it, because we got over just at the notch of time to put the last spur to the horse as all of us were winning the race, and there is more than ordinary reason in our claim. But the truth is, Mr. President, that we all gained it, and no country by itself did it; and the less we all boast about it chauvinistically the better. It was a gain of civilization and freedom against barbarism and autocracy; and all the peoples of all the world, united against that sort of infamous thing, gained this great victory.

Who were they who at the time were disloyal? Who were they who at the time, inhabiting parts of the countries of the allied forces, did not render their aid, but, upon the contrary, tried to use a snaffle bit upon the advancing progress of civilization and liberty? Whoever they may be, they are the only people who deserve no credit. All the balance deserve full credit—our boys in the Army, whether in the Engineers, or in the Infantry, or in the Cavalry, or in the Artillery, some of them here at home working very hard—all helped.

Why should we, when we come to consider a great question like the league of nations, concerning us as an international question, divide ourselves not according to our judgment of what ought to be, but according to what our European racial derivations seem to demand in affection, or, worse, hatred? What right have any of us to deal with our European racial derivations? Can you be an American and still retain that mental reservation? You may think you can, but you can not. A man can not serve God and mammon 100 per cent each at the same time. You may have a different opinion from mine about which is God and which is mammon, but there can not be any difference of opinion about serving each 100 per cent.

Mr. President, if I had a plea to make—not to the American Senate, because that would be utterly useless—every man here knows already just how he is going to vote upon every proposition, and he knows in the inside of his heart just why—the motive may be worthy or unworthy, but he knows—if I had a plea to make to the American people it would be this, "Let us be one people. Let us be Americans, nonhyphenated. Let us forget whence we came. Let us remember only where we are. Let us keep in front of us the ideal of this great American people, and let us not destroy that ideal by making 14 or 15 European racially-derived ideals out of that one; and let us also remember that we are in the advance guard of the files of time, and that, being there, we are trying to do the utmost we can for a just and enduring peace—for our own interests, yes; for the interests of the world, yes; for both interests taken together, yes—to do something that will be worthy of having been done while we were living here our short span of 60 or 70 years, a work worthy of the peace of the world and of the Prince of Peace, who, as the only begotten Son of God, has bidden us to ask for peace."

Oh, it is easy to find fault with every covenant and agreement for peace or for anything else. I picked up an article the other day that said that Thomas Jefferson opposed the Constitution of the United States. He did not do any such thing. Upon the contrary, he suggested that it be adopted and that afterwards it be amended, and he suggested the amendments, and nearly all of them were adopted. So my voice has been, from the beginning of this contention right down to now, that we should pass this covenant with the fewest amendments or reservations possible, and then afterwards propose, by resolution of Congress or otherwise, to the peace league the amendments that we think would make it better and stronger and more efficient and less sacrificial of American interests, if there be any undue sacrifice of American interests in the league at all. Some sacrifice of interest for so great a purpose all countries must. Here sacrifice is God's service.

God knows my heart is the heart in any accidental assemblage of any 20 or 30 or 100 men most devoid of hatred for anybody or any race or anything else. I have never had a word of excoriation to give anybody in connection with this great peace purpose, except somebody that seemed to me to be acting not as an American but as something else, somehow to serve some ulterior European purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, it is unnecessary for me to say how painful this incident is. It has been coming to me, however, for a long time, and it might just as well have happened to-day as at any time.

Since my speech a month ago, it has been very apparent that the first opportunity would be sought to impute improper motives to me, to lessen my influence in this body, and in other ways to let it be known that I was committing a very grievous offense by differing from my party associates.

Words were not necessary to convince me how my utterances were received by the Senator from Mississippi. The attitude of some Members on this floor—very, very, very few—has demonstrated that I would, sooner or later, receive their denunciation; and so the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] sat at a desk in front of me to-day, listening for words to drop from my lips that might give him a chance to distort my utterances and say what was in his heart toward me.

"I stand here as a descendant of subject races." If it pleases you better, sir, I will speak more plainly. I stand here as the son of a humble Irish immigrant mother and father. Is that un-American? Have we not heard from the lips of the Senator repeatedly of the Welsh ancestry that he came from, and have we not heard him boast of that ancestry? Dare not an American come to the United States Senate and raise his voice in protest against America changing its policy toward subject races?

I speak for no European races. The Irish and English question has no business in this chamber, but the relation of the American Government to that question has some business in this Chamber; and when these people have believed—mistakenly, if you please—and have thought, honestly and sincerely, that this covenant of a league of nations meant the United States joining with their oppressor, in God's name what is there in American institutions that prevents them from having the right of petition, the right of protest? Has the right of petition and of protest gone from America? Yes, according to some, it has. "If you are of Irish ancestry, accept this covenant or you are pro-Irish and un-American; if you are of Italian or Lithuanian or Greek ancestry, accept this covenant, for if you protest you are pro-Italian, pro-Lithuanian, or pro-Greek, and un-American," and so on. That is the argument.

This same Senator would stand on this floor and eulogize me in the choice language that he can use, and which he does use so effectively, if I stood here and said, "As a descendant of subject races, I say this league of nations covenant will mean the freedom of every subject race." If I said that and took that position, he and every other man on this side of the Chamber would commend me.

Every other man on this side of the Chamber does commend me for the position I have taken, though they disagree with me and think my conclusions unsound; and they may think I have reasoned improperly; but I know them well enough to know that they respect my views and my opinions, much as they regret the conclusion at which I have arrived.

I repeat, I would be a patriot, I would be an American, acceptable even to the Senator from Mississippi, did I stultify in my breast the feeling and conviction that this covenant of a league of nations is a status quo covenant, is a determination upon the part of the great powers of the world to organize and through force to maintain peace by perpetuating existing boundary lines and existing political integrity. If I believed that, what kind of a man would I be to sit in this Chamber and refuse to speak and cast my vote with my party associates?

Mr. President, it does not become the Senator from Mississippi to speak in the derogatory manner that he has of the race from which I have sprung. Almost all Senators on the other side of the Chamber might have in the heat of debate uttered such words, for, possibly, at some time or other they have faced the political strength of this element in opposition to their party candidates, as the element referred to have cast their votes almost invariably for candidates of the same political belief as the Senator from Mississippi. It does not lie in the mouth of Senators from the South to say an unkind word about the American citizens of Irish blood, for, since the days of the Civil War, of all the elements of our population that have stood side by side with them for the same great political principles one of the chief has been that element of the population which the Senator from Mississippi now denounces. So I say that it does not become him to denounce this particular element. I for one am sick and tired, in and out of this Chamber and in all parts of the country, of hearing men who differ with other men being called pro-German, pro-Irish, un-American, Bolsheviki, and anarchistic.

Has it come to this that we no longer respect the differences of opinion of men on great public questions and on great issues? Has it come to this that a man has to be charged with prejudice and with bias when he takes a position on a public question simply because of race, simply because of creed, simply because of political faith? What progress have we made in 140 years of free institutions if that is to be the story, if that is to be the conclusion at which we have arrived? I have said no word against the Senator from Mississippi. I have been in the Senate for five months. I have never uttered a word on the floor of this Chamber in the slightest degree derogatory of any Senator. If God gives me strength and health, I shall be here for five years and a half more, and I challenge any man, when I leave this Chamber, to say that I have ever uttered an unkind word toward any associate of mine. I do not know but what I am un-American in that respect; but my political experience has taught me to judge my fellow men as being as sincere as myself and fight them not on personal grounds, not on racial grounds, not on religious grounds, but upon great political principles, recognizing their right to differ from me and my right to differ from them and giving them due credit for doing the things which they believe to be in the best interest of our common beloved country.

"I am the offspring of subject races," sir, and I am proud of it. I did not hear the children of subject races, the children of Irish or Italian or Welsh or Scotch or German even, or any other race, called un-American when the plea went forth for all Americans to enlist and join the Army and Navy in fighting the oppressor of humanity and the destroyer of democracy throughout the world. Are the sons of subject races to be of service to America only in time of war? Are they to be denied the right of free speech and of protest in times of peace? Are they un-American because they differ with the Senator from Mississippi?

"A descendant of subject people," sir! You attempt to put in my mouth the words that I am not an American. Can not a man be of Irish birth; can not a man be a descendant of subject races; can not a man be of Hebrew or Protestant or Catholic faith and be proud of it, and yet be an American? Can not a man speak as a Democrat and yet be an American? Can not a man speak as a Republican and yet be an American? And can not an American Senator, who is a descendant of a subject race, call attention to the fact that this compact in its present form may be a dangerous change in the policy of America? Do not misunderstand my position. I protest as an American citizen and as an American Senator against America joining in any compact with European powers which may change the whole policy of the United States of America in its attitude of sympathy and of aid toward subject people. That is my position.

Mr. President, it is unnecessary for me to say more. I make no reference to the birth, I make no boast, as the Senator from Mississippi might well make of his or his family's allegiance or want of allegiance to this Government in the years that have passed. I come to this conclusion: I leave it to my associates on both sides of this Chamber, men who differ from me and men who agree with me, to judge of my service to this hour and my service in the future years as to whether I am entitled to be known and called an American Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course a man may be "the offspring of subject races" and be the finest American citizen in the world. In the next place, I made no attack upon the Irish as a race. A man who loves Edmund Burke, the prince of orators, and Tom Moore, the sweet singer, as much as I do, a man who loves Oliver Goldsmith as much as I do, could not make an attack upon the Irish people as a people or upon the Irish race as a race. The Senator knows full well that I made no such attack. I made an attack only upon those of them who, in my opinion, were fighting the league of nations because of European interests of one sort or another.

Mr. President, the Senator, I think, tries to switch the question a little. He became very eloquent because of his assertion—and it is barely an assertion, and the assertion can not be borne out by anything except crass ignorance, and I ask the attention of the Senator—that the United States would change its relationship toward Ireland because of the tenth article; and he then changes his premise in order to fortify his conclusion, and forgets all about the tenth article and the wording of it. The tenth article makes us agree to defend the territorial integrity and independence of the other members of the league against "external" attack, and the Senator from Massachusetts knows as well as I do that an Irish revolt, or rebellion, or revolution—whatever it might be called, depending upon its success or defeat—would not be an external attack, but would be an internal upheaval. So, quietly changing his middle premise so as to fortify his conclusion, he insinuates the idea that under article 10 of this treaty the United States would be compelled to maintain the territorial integrity of Great Britain against an Irish revolution or an Irish revolt.

I have too much respect for the intelligence of a Senator who has been for two terms the governor of one of the greatest Commonwealths of this Union to believe that he believes that the tenth article of this treaty says anything of the sort intimated by him or that it could possibly mean anything of that sort. He knows, as well as I do, that this guaranty of territorial integrity and political independence is directed against external aggression and not against internal revolution; and he knows, as well as I do, if he knows anything, that the President of the United States stood in Paris and insisted upon that very limitation. But for that distinction this would have been a successor of the Holy Alliance. But with it, it is not. It becomes the very opposite.

We do not guarantee to any sovereign or any emperor or any king or any government, whether republican or monarchical, that it shall not divide itself when a part of its people wish to part company with the balance of its people, provided they have the power to do it and provided they do do it.

But what I rose chiefly for to-day, Mr. President, was to deny what I have seen in the newspapers everywhere, that I had made an attack upon the entire Irish race. It is untrue. I made an attack upon a part of them, and I designated what part. They might just as well say that I made an attack upon the entire German people because some of the German-Americans in America were disloyal and were trying to blow up American ships with American passengers and goods on board. I would have a right to direct my attention to them. And yet no man feels more kindly than I toward German-Americans of the right stripe or even toward Germans in Germany of the right stripe.

I had too many friends amonst them in my youth. I have too many friends amongst them now that war has separated them from me even in epistolary communication. I have a right, sir, to demand that American foreign relationships shall be settled from the standpoint of solely, purely, and altogether 100 per cent American interests, without any regard whatsoever to European derivation. That is all I insist upon. I say the man who mixes up those things, whether consciously or unconsciously, whether wittingly or unwittingly, proves that he does not understand the conditions and the ideals and the substance and the soul of this American Republic.

The Senator referred to the fact that I had been proud of my European ancestors. Everybody here had European ancestors, and everybody not ashamed of himself is more or less proud of them; at least, he tries to make out that he is, whether he is or not. Only a few of us are derived from American Indians. The American Indian was the real American, you know, at the beginning, and is yet. But when we came here and undertook this Government, this greatest experiment of human liberty upon the surface of the earth, we made an implicit agreement with one another that we would consecrate and dedicate ourselves to that purpose. We left Europe behind us when we did it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise simply to express the hope that we now dispose of the reservation by taking the necessary vote. But as I have taken the floor, Mr. President, I wish to say a single word in regard to the discussion which has been going on.

My colleague needs no defense at my hands. He is entirely able to defend himself, as he has just demonstrated to the Senate. But I should like to make this one remark: He and I have been during many years as far apart politically, I suppose, in our own State as two men could be. But I happen to know something of the consideration which he has been giving to this treaty since he made his speech—not before. I have talked with him about it, and I can say here that I do not think any man ever took a difficult step—and it was difficult for him as a Democrat—and determined on a course of action from more purely conscientious motives than my colleague.

Mr. President, I do not wonder that the Senator from Mississippi recoils at the words "subject races." He is familiar with a subject race; he lives among them. But why my colleague should be upbraided because he has said that he is the offspring of a subject race I can not conceive.

I can say this in addition: No matter what race he springs from—and he springs from one with which the world is familiar, a race of great talent and brilliancy—he is as good an American as I know. I do not think it is necessary to go back and examine every man's genealogy and ancestry to determine whether he is an American. The tests for that are very different and rest on a man's conduct or his loyalty to the United States in peace and war and upon his adherence to American principles.

I merely wished to say these few words because I would not have my silence, when my colleague was assailed in the way he has been, to be by any chance misunderstood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the substitute proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to have the substitute read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the substitute.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, known as reservation No. 3, insert the following words:

That the suggestions of the council of the league of nations as to the means of carrying the obligations of article 10 into effect are only advisory, and that any undertaking under the provisions of article 10 the execution of which may require the use of American military or naval forces or economic measure can under the Constitution be carried out only by the action of the Congress, and that the failure of the Congress to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league or to provide such military or naval forces or economic measures shall not constitute a violation of the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word with reference to the proposed substitute. It leaves the direct obligation under article 10 by which the United States undertakes to preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and the existing political independence of members of the league. It in no way lessens the binding force of the first half of that article. It leaves our country morally bound to put troops into battle whenever the territorial integrity or the political independence of any member of the league is assailed externally. This provision, if ratified, at once commits the United States to send troops into practically every future war.

I will not vote to ratify such a proposition. I will not vote for a provision that leaves article 10 placing an obligation upon us to enter every war that comes to the world, and the substitute proposed by the Senator from Colorado leaves that obligation. Therefore I shall vote against the proposed substitute.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If the motion of the Senator from Colorado to substitute the reservation just read for reservation numbered 3 is defeated, will reservation numbered 3 be subject to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it would be. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when Mr. HALE's name was called). The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is paired for the day with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON]. If present and permitted to vote, the Senator from Maine would vote "nay."

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. If he were here, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. POINDEXTER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is necessarily absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. If present my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. REED. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], who is confined to his room by illness. If he were present and not paired, he would vote "nay." He is paired on this vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is detained on account of illness. Were he present he would vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—36.

So Mr. THOMAS's amendment to reservation No. 3 was rejected.

Mr. BORAH. I send to the desk a substitute, which I offer in lieu of reservation numbered 3, as reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the reservation reported by the committee known as reservation numbered 3, substitute the following:

3. The United States assumes no obligation, legal or moral, under article 10 and shall not be bound by any of the terms or conditions of said article.

Mr. BORAH. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when Mr. BANKHEAD's name was called). I renew the announcement which I made on the last vote with reference to my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] and his pair, and ask that that announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I understand if present he would vote "nay." As I intend also to vote in the negative, I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called.) Making the same announcement as previously in respect to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. POINDEXTER's name was called). I again announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] on account of illness. I am not advised as to how he would vote on this amendment if present.

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OWEN. On this amendment I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 68, as follows:

So Mr. BORAH's amendment to reservation No. 3, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon the reservation as proposed by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I move to strike out from the reservation the following words, appearing in lines 11, 12, and 13, on page 2, namely, "or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana to the reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana and Mr. JONES of New Mexico called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with respect to my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. If present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. I desire to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] if present would have voted "nay." He is paired.

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 45, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana to reservation No. 3, proposed by Mr. LODGE, was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the reservation proposed by the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the amendment which I send to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of reservation No. 3 the following:

And the United States hereby releases all members of the league from any obligation to it under Article 10 and declines to participate in any proceeding by the council authorized thereby.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment again read.

Mr. LODGE. I also should like to have it again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. WALSH of Montana to the reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been called for. Is the call seconded?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if it is subject to amendment, I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] by striking out of the amendment the words "and declines to participate in any proceeding by the council authorized thereby."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. With that stricken out, we are in a more inconsistent position than we were before. If we participate in the council and in the assembly, we necessarily take some obligation by reason of our participation.

I think the amendment as offered by the Senator from Montana is an amendment which is complete within itself, and ought to be adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. I am one Member of the Senate who believes that we can get something good out of this covenant, confused and complicated as it is, and wickedly as it has been involved with the treaty. Its inception, birth, and growth up to the time it reached the Senate are unworthy of so great a cause as peace. But I think it is our duty now to do the very best we can with it in order that the opportunity to do something to prevent war shall not go entirely unimproved.

I can think of conditions under which article 10 may be of great importance, not only to the world, but to the United States. I have no objection to any other nation taking the step that we propose to take, namely, place it within the power of their legislative body, if they have one, to determine when their military forces shall be employed to carry out any conclusions of the council and assembly. I do not believe that the United States is inconsistent in providing that our Congress shall first pass upon what the council recommends, before any attempt shall be made to send our Army and Navy overseas. I want to preserve that part of article 10 that is good, and allow other nations the same freedom of choice and action that we have.

I am not concerned so much in what they do as I am in what we do. I have consistently voted not to intermeddle with other countries, and I will not change that policy now. It would have been better to vote for the amendment presented by the senior Senator from Idaho, which would have struck the section out, rather than make a farce of it by adopting the amendment of the Senator from Montana. If, however, we are to preserve section 10, we ought to give it some ability for good.

I am simply voicing my own opinion in reference to the matter. I am not considering reservations to this measure in a captious manner. I am seeking to do what seems to be best for our country and for the world. Therefore I can not support an amendment of this kind, which relieves the United States from any responsibility, however harmless it might be or however beneficial it might be for the world and for our country. I trust that the amendment will be defeated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. REED. What is that amendment? May it be stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out from the last portion of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana these words:

And declines to participate in any proceeding by the council authorized thereby.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the only merit in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is to be stricken out if the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is adopted. I am in thorough and hearty accord with the spirit of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, and I will cheerfully vote for it; but because that very spirit is stricken out by the proposed amendment of the Senator from Utah, I shall vote against his amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator conceive that there might be some functions that the United States might perform in the league, though some of the reciprocal obligations would be stricken from the article by the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FALL. None at all, except of an advisory nature, of a counsel sitting at a table, without a vote, but merely as a counsel; and that is exactly the position we will be in if the amendment of the Senator from Montana is adopted. We should then sit there as a counsel. If the other nations should choose to call upon us for advice in any matters which they may be considering under article 10, we can give the counsel, but we will decline to assume any responsibility whatsoever for any results that may ensue.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Montana be read, as proposed to be amended by the amendment of the Senator from Utah. It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Montana is logic itself, and that those who feel as many of us do on this side of the Chamber should support it, especially if the amendment of the Senator from Utah be defeated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana, and then the amendment as it would read if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah were adopted.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Montana proposes to add, at the end of what is known as reservation No. 3, the following:

And the United States hereby releases all members of the league from any obligation to it under article 10, and declines to participate in any proceeding by the council authorized thereby.

The Senator from Utah proposes to strike out the words:

And declines to participate in any proceeding by the council authorized thereby.

So that, if amended, the amendment will read:

And the United States hereby releases all members of the league from any obligation to it under article 10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BORAH. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I just want to call attention to the fact that this amendment goes very much further than the reservation. The reservation relieves the United States from any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other nation, but leaves the obligation of the United States to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of every other nation. The amendment of the Senator from Montana would relieve every other member of the league from the obligation to respect the territorial integrity of the United States. It ought to be defeated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senate desires to vote on this proposition to-night, so I shall occupy only a moment.

I think that the language "and declines to participate in any proceeding by the council authorized thereby" is the very life of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana. I am sure he offers this amendment in good faith, and because he wants to strengthen the reservation. I could not conceive of the Senator from Montana offering anything from any other motive than that of the most sincere desire to perfect and round out the amendment.

Mr. President, if the United States is not to be bound by the action of the council under article 10, then we ought to decline to participate in the proceedings of the council taken in pursuance of the authority of article 10. If we are to decline responsibility for the decision, we ought to decline participation in the deliberation. It is perfectly consistent for the United States to keep itself in a position to exercise a free hand.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] points out that the reservation as now written still binds the United States to respect the territorial integrity of every other nation. If that phrase were to be given its ordinary meaning, isolated from everything else—that is to say, if we were merely to agree, as a general proposition, that we would respect the territorial integrity of other nations in the ordinary sense—I would not object to it. But as a part of this league covenant I think it means that we bind ourselves under no circumstances, except the particular circumstances specified in the covenant, to invade another country.

I am not unmindful of the fact that it may be necessary before to-morrow morning to invade Mexico and not to respect its territorial integrity. I am not an advocate of war, and I hope that we will not have war with Mexico; but if Mexico continues to kidnap officers of this Government, and if Mexico continues its outrages upon American life and American property I want the United States to be in a position to bring Mexico to book at any time the United States thinks it ought to act. I am not in favor of tying the hands of this Government in the slightest degree or for the smallest appreciable period of time. We ought to be in a position to protect ourselves. That might require an invasion of Mexico at any moment.

If there is anybody here who wants to surrender that right of the United States, they, of course, have the right, or at least they have the authority, if the theory of the proponents of this league is correct, to surrender it. I do not believe it can be surrendered, but the obstacle would be created.

I know it may be said that Mexico is not a member of the league; therefore we are at liberty to act at this present moment. But if the theory of the league is carried out, Mexico can become a member, and in that event we would be deprived of the high right, and the exercise of what might become the very highest duty, of acting instantly and upon our own motion. The murder of American——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. In one moment. The murder of American women, the murder of American men, the destruction of American property, the violation of all the rules of amity and good will that ought to exist between nations, which has been the constant performance of Mexico now for nearly eight years, make it incumbent on Congress to hesitate before it signs away the right of the United States to protect its nationals, to protect its officers, and to protect the property of the people of the United States.

I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I wanted to ask the Senator from Missouri if it is not only possible under the terms of the league for Mexico hereafter to become a member of the league, but if it is not incumbent on the other members, under article 17 of the covenant, to invite her to become a member of the league for purposes of any dispute?

Mr. REED. I think that is correct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the hasty reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] I was not clear but what the purpose was to exclude the United States from participating at all in any activities of the council. Since I have had an opportunity to examine his amendment I find that it is not as broad as I apprehended, and I therefore withdraw the amendment to the amendment which I submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, my attention was attracted by what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] said just now. He said he did not desire to have article 10 destroyed by Senator WALSH's amendment to the committee reservation, because he felt that a great deal of good could be accomplished for the world through article 10. I can agree with the Senator that a great deal of good could be accomplished out of article 10 as article 10 existed. But there will be no article 10 if the reservation submitted by the committee is adopted. The reservation simply states that we reserve the right to do what we can do now without the treaty. It says that in any particular case we may assume obligations by an act of Congress. We can do that now. We did do that in the last war. Under the reservation we assume no obligations under the treaty. We deny all obligations under the treaty. We simply reassert in the reservation a right that we already have. It is pure camouflage. Instead of striking out article 10, which would attract the attention of the country and bring down reproach upon those who do it, they attempt to destroy article 10 under the guise that something of it is left. There is nothing left of it.

It is my intention to support the amendment of the Senator from Montana, because it makes a little plainer to the people of the country that there is no article 10 as far as the United States is concerned. I intend to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Montana, and then, if that should be adopted, I will vote against the reservation in its amended form, because it will still mean nothing to the United States. The Walsh amendment is simply a declaration to those who do not understand that the existing reservation is a fraud. It leaves us in the position that the Senator from Montana has already explained, of proposing that other nations support us in our troubles, while we deny that in any case we will support them in their troubles under any provision of the treaty. I intend to vote for the amendment, and I intend to vote against the committee reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada makes a very moving appeal in behalf of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana. I think the people of the country understand very well what this reservation means, that it disposes of article 10 so far as we are concerned, and effectively disposes of it.

Mr. President, I have proceeded, in all I have tried to do, on the simple theory of clearing the United States, so far as possible, from obligations imposed by the league in which I do not wish to see the United States involved. Every country can take care of itself, and I have never thought it was our duty to look after them.

One of the arguments that has been made here against the equality of the voting frequently is that other countries should demand it. Very well, let them demand it if they desire it; and if other countries like article 10 I have not the slightest objection to their remaining in it. I prefer to pursue the simple course of not meddling with their affairs, but protecting and guarding, so far as I can, the United States. I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I quite concur in what the Senator from Massachusetts said, but I wish to add just a word in further answer to the Senator from Nevada.

The committee reservation provides that before the United States will interfere with the controversies between foreign nations, and employ its military and naval forces, the Congress shall authorize it. The President told the country that the results under article 10 could be nothing but advice, always subject to the action of Congress. He said there could be no action of the kind mentioned in the committee reservation unless and until Congress authorized it. I have insisted that that verbal understanding between the President and the representatives of the other allied countries should be put in writing; and that is what this reservation does. Notwithstanding all refinements of definitions, the proposition is simply to make clear and unequivocal that which all agree should be the meaning of article 10.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the reservation only went as far as the Senator from Michigan states that it goes, in his opinion, it would not be objectionable. The reservation, however, goes very much further. If it merely stated that the armed forces of the United States should not be employed under article 10 without the express authority of the Congress of the United States, there would be no objection to it.

If it also stated, in addition, that the advice to be given by the council of the league should be considered merely as advice, and that the Congress of the United States and the Government of the United States should be at liberty to accept it or reject it as, in the judgment of the Government of the United States, might seem right, there would be no objection to that. But this reservation plainly goes very much further than that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator understand that article 10 is to be employed by the President in sending into Europe armed forces, our boys, without the consent and advice of the Congress?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then what is the objection to stating that Congress must act before obligations are incurred?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I voted to-day for the substitute for this reservation offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which specifically provided that under article 10 the armed forces of the United States, military and naval, should not be employed without the authority of Congress, and I am willing to go further and state, as a part of the reservation, that the advice which the council of the league may give to the nations as to the use of armed forces shall be considered as mere advice, and not as instructions, and that it may be accepted or rejected according to the judgment of the Congress then in being.

But, Mr. President, this reservation goes much further than that. Let me quote to the Senator how much further it goes. Article 10 provides that the members of the league undertake to respect and preserve, as against outside aggression, the territorial integrity and political independence of the members. But the very first words of this reservation are:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country.

That is a direct and offensive repudiation of a statement in the covenant of the league. It is a direct and obnoxious repudiation of the very spirit of the league. It goes very much further than protecting the United States from the possible danger that its armed forces might be called into the field, either by the council or the President, or by both combined.

There is not any objection on this side of the Chamber, so far as I know, and the President has not objected, to a reservation which shall provide that the advice of the league shall be mere advice, and that the Congress of the United States shall be free to accept it or reject it, just as any other member of the league shall be free to accept or reject it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator know that the amendment he just voted for is the very amendment that the President of the United States read at the Salt Lake meeting, in which he said that it would take the heart out of the instrument?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I know the Senator from Utah makes that contention, but I have taken the trouble to compare the text, and I find that the Senator from Utah is wrong; which he very seldom is, I will say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will continue to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood from a Senator who had a copy of it that he had compared it word for word, but I suppose there was a mistake made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was a mistake.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] offered two sets of reservations, and the last set of reservations which he offered contains the substance of the Salt Lake comment, whereas I offered as a substitute the first reservation upon that subject offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, so far as my humble part in this affair is concerned, I have put my cards on the table. But I want to know what the attitude of the Senator from Nebraska and the other Senators on that side is going to be in case we put this amendment in. Do you propose then to support that reservation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have not stated yet that I was going to support the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. BORAH. It is offered from the other side of the Chamber. I am perfectly willing to put it in. I have no desire to indulge in child's play, however. If, after it is put in, do you propose to kill the reservation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is supporting a reservation on the other side to be incorporated in the resolution of ratification. Does the Senator intend to vote for the resolution afterwards?

Mr. BORAH. No. I do not hesitate to state my position, and all I ask is that the Senator shall state his.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I may not be quite so prompt in stating my position, but the Senator will ascertain it in course of time.

Mr. President, the amendment which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] offers is intended, I presume, to reveal the vice of the particular reservation now before us. What right has the United States to repudiate an obligation, to make an exception of itself, while yet assuming that other nations which have ratified the treaty, and which will ratify the treaty, shall be bound to a greater extent than the United States will be bound?

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The United States can not repudiate an obligation that it has not yet entered into; and, in the second place, in making this reservation, it is entirely in the option of the other members of the league whether they care to accept the United States in the league under those conditions. So there is nothing unfair about it in any way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The United States may not be repudiating an obligation in a treaty which it has not yet ratified, but the Senator from Wisconsin well knows that if that does become a reservation in the treaty we will repudiate a moral obligation which we have already assumed.

Mr. PENROSE. Who assumed it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We assumed it.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. PENROSE. When and where?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will tell the Senators when and where.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I was astounded to hear from so able a Senator as the representative of the minority in this contest the statement that we had assumed an obligation. How have we assumed it? Who committed us? By what authority?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator himself, for one.

Mr. PENROSE. In what way?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. By voting for the Army bill, for instance, in which we organized the Slavic legion, in which we invited the Slavs of the United States to volunteer, although they were technically citizens of Austria, to serve in our Army and go across the ocean and fight against the nation to which they owed allegiance, in the hope that they would assist us in defeating Austria. We asssumed that obligation when we encouraged the Poles to throw off their allegiance. We assumed that obligation when we encouraged the Bohemians, technically known as the Jugoslovaks, to throw off their allegiance to Austria.

This Nation went as far as it could in inviting those subject peoples to rebel, and why? Because in speeches here upon the floor of the Senate and upon the floor of the House of Representatives and elsewhere in the country representative citizens proclaimed that if the United States and her associates were successful in the war the old nation of Poland should be revived, and Bohemia should become a nation in the world, and the Jugo-Slavs should be permitted to organize their nation. We were committed morally to those subject peoples. We encouraged them to struggle and we practically guaranteed them that we and our associate nations would stand by them in guaranteeing their independence. Many public men, notably former Senator Root, and, I believe, also Mr. Hughes, have taken the position that at least for five years we ought to stand by the moral obligations we assumed.

Those nations would not have come into being if it had not been for the United States, and we propose here in this reservation to run and leave Great Britain and France and Italy and other nations to see that Germany does not again destroy the independence of Bohemia, Poland, and Jugo-Slavia.

I say, therefore, to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that we do repudiate a moral obligation which we assumed, and if we run from that moral obligation we ought to be ashamed to look in the faces of hundreds of thousands of Poles in the United States who enlisted in the Army of the United States in larger proportion than any foreign-born people in the United States. We would repudiate the moral obligation that we owe to the Slavs in the United States, to the Serbs in the United States, and to all the others, and we would place ourselves in a shameful position with these struggling little nations that have just come into being under the moral promise of the United States that we would stand by Great Britain and France and Italy in guaranteeing them an existance.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I deny that there is any obligation, moral or otherwise, to preserve the territorial integrity of any nation upon earth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator desire to ask a question?

Mr. LENROOT. I am going to do so. I ask the Senator how it is that a few moments ago he said he was perfectly willing that this reservation should be so modified as not to compel the use of our troops in Europe without the consent of Congress?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is very obvious. They could not be used under the Constitution, and it was never intended that they should be used simply at the dictation of the league of nations. The council gives advice as to how the obligation in article 10 shall be carried out. The United States has a representative on that council. The council can not even give the advice until the representative of the United States gives his assent to the advice being given.

But when that advice has been given, still there has got to be the authoritative action of every nation represented in the league; and when it comes to the United States, it is the Congress which shall decide whether the advice shall be taken, not this Congress that we have here now. This Congress is not the one to decide whether there is an obligation. It is the Congress which will be in being at the time the emergency arises, and we have not any business here in this Congress to say whether or not there is an obligation. It is for the Congress that is in being at the time, a Congress which I suppose will be just as competent to decide whether there is a moral obligation as this Congress would be.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the Senator's position that while Congress must decide, Congress will be obliged under article 10 to decide in one particular way?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it is not.

Mr. LENROOT. If not, then why is the Senator objecting to this reservation, which will leave Congress absolutely free?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I object to it because it states that the United States assumes no obligation. We have not any business to say that the United States assumes no obligation. This Congress ought not to undertake to determine that. It is a question for the Congress 10 years or 5 years from now. It is for that Congress to decide whether there is an obligation.

Mr. LENROOT. That is exactly what this reservation says—that Congress later on may assume the obligation; but the Senator wants the Senate now to assume it for all time to come.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I do not want the Senate to notify the nations that are associated with us and that are parties to this treaty that we assume no obligation. I want that to remain for the time to come when the Congress then in being shall have the authority to say whether the obligation shall exist.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. What obligation does the Senator propose that we shall now assume?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The obligations under article 10. It is very plain:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the members of the league.

That is not all.

> In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

That is plain. It requires the unanimous vote of the council to merely give the advise, and we are perfectly willing to say that it is for the Congress then in being to decide whether that obligation has arisen and whether or not the advice shall be taken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is not the Senator willing to trust the Congress then in being?

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly, and that is why I am for this reservation, and I can not see, for the life of me, why the Senator from Nebraska, instead of arguing for article 10, is not arguing for the reservation that the committee proposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask the Senator, if he wishes simply to let the Congress then in session determine the moral obligation, why does he insist upon putting into this treaty a new moral obligation by declaring in the treaty that we will undertake to preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every member of the league? Does not that put a new obligation which will control morally the next Congress, and is not the real question involved the proposition that you should leave the next Congress free to act without this new moral obligation?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. Suppose the reservation were drawn in the words I shall read:

> 3. The United States, in assuming the obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or existing political ind pendence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to emp oy the military or naval forces of the United States, does so with the understanding that the advice or recommendation of the council or assembly under articles 10 and 15 is purely advisory and absolutely subject to the judgment and action of the Congress of the United States under the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all right, except that you assume the responsibility, and if you assume the responsibility under the first half of article 10 you must carry it out and preserve that integrity without regard to the advice of the council. If they gave no advice, the obligation would be upon us to do what was necessary to preserve and protect the territorial integrity of every member of the league.

Mr. OWEN. The mechanism of the council and the assembly is provided for giving the advice and for giving the recommendations under article 15. The mechanism requires unanimous consent. When that unanimous consent is given by the council or when the recommendation is made by the council, then the United States, through its Congress, would pass upon the validity of the advice, whether it was sound and wise or whether it was not. The United States, in receiving advice, is not obligated to act upon the advice favorably if the advice be manifestly unjust or unsound.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the first half of article 1 without regard to the advice assumes an affirmative obligation to preserve and protect the territorial integrity of every member of the league against external aggression. That obligation we assume now for the first time as a result of this treaty, if we take it at all. There is the fundamental objection that I have and that many have which prevents us from voting to ratify the treaty unless it is modified.

Mr. OWEN. That is the objection of the Senator from Georgia, but that is not the objection of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have said what I have about moral obligation because I believe it would be dastardly for the United States to say that "we will not assume it, that we wash our hands of it. Our associate nations are bound to protect you from Germany, but we wash our hands of the obligation." I believe it would be dastardly for the United States to say to the people of Bohemia, "You came into the fight, you helped to win the war, you sacrificed tens of thousands of your sons, with every indication that the United States, ahead of all the other nations, when the old nation of Bohemia was restored, would stand by you."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I must protest against the Senator constantly repeating the statement that the United States by this reservation opposes Poland or any other country struggling against oppression. There is not a word in the reservation that can be properly construed in that manner. If we enter upon the treaty, we propose to respect the territorial boundaries and political integrity of Governments, but we say when you ask us to maintain the present boundaries against external aggression, that the Congress first shall pass upon that question. Maybe the Congress in being when a question of armed intervention arises will favor such action; maybe it will not. Neither Poland nor Armenia nor any other country doubts the sympathy and support of the United States, and they know that it understands best when and how to act. They are not afraid that this country will fail to do its duty, and no nation will ever again engage in a great war without considering the attitude of the United States. It is not true that we are running away from duty and responsibility. We are keeping free to act as the people through their representatives shall deem best when the occasion for action arises.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We leave our hands free and we leave Germany free. If we say here in this reservation that the United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of Poland, Germany knows what it means. Germany knows that it does not have to reckon with the United States. If we say the United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of Bohemia, Germany knows what it means and the Bohemians know what it means. They know we have repudiated the moral obligation we undertook, to stand by the young nations that we helped to create. So the Jugo-Slavs, many of whom are in this country and I suppose 13,000,000 of whom are in Europe, when they see the Senate of the United States declare that the United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or the political independence of the Serb, Croat, Slovene State, they know that we have deserted them, and Germany knows it. It is an invitation to Germany to begin war to reconquer the people that we helped to free from her.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Nebraska has referred to our obligations implied in some fashion to the Jugo-Slavs and the Czechs and Poles. I should like his judgment as to our obligation to the Koreans under article 10.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, the Koreans ceased to be a nation a good many years ago, and the United States recognized that fact at the time. We practically drove the Korean minister from Washington at that time, and, in my opinion, we committed an international crime when we did so. I think under the treaty of 1848 we were bound to Korea, but when Korea appealed to us under that treaty we repudiated it. That, however, is no reason why we should repudiate the moral obligation we have undertaken to the little nations of Europe. Think of the effect in those countries of the announcement that the United States assumes no obligation for their protection? Ex-Senator Root said we should assume that obligation for at least five years.

How do you expect them to establish themselves? As I recall, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] here upon the floor of the Senate made a speech in which he said it was the duty of the United States to see to the reestablishment of Poland. What does reestablishment mean—merely setting up the nation and then announcing to Germany that we do not propose to stand by it? Is that adhering to the agreement? Is that carrying out the purposes of the United States to reestablish the nation of Poland?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. FALL. I will speak in my own time, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think there is any other Senator who is asking me to yield at the present time, except the Senator from Idaho, and I yield to him.

Mr. BORAH. I was wondering how long we were going to work to-night.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer the question of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a question which it is very difficult for me to answer. I am ready either to vote or to adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts say what he meant on the floor here when in 1918 he declared that it was the duty of the United States to see that the nation of Poland was restored. Did he mean simply to say that it was to be restored temporarily and then that we should cut and run? Did he mean then that we should adopt a reservation in which we would declare that Poland should not have the guarantee which this treaty gives? Did he mean then that the United States assumed no moral obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of the country which he proposed to create? If that is what the Senator assumed at that time, he is justified.

Mr. LODGE. I will tell the Senator what I did not mean, and that was that we should keep armies in Europe indefinitely to sustain Poland or any other country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not required to keep armies in Europe indefinitely to sustain Poland. If Germany knows that the nations of the world have pledged themselves to see that Poland remains and that the Czecho-Slovak State remains and that the little Serb-Croat-Slovene State in the south of Europe remains—if Germany knows that we are pledged to their independence, to maintain their territorial integrity, Germany will not attack them; but when Germany learns through the mouth of the Senate that we propose to run, that we are not going to carry out that obligation, then we practically invite Germany to overrun them and subjugate them.

Mr. PENROSE. May I ask the Senator one question before this interesting debate is concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. What consolation is Germany finding to-day in the total evaporation into space of the 14 points?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know that I can answer the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. She is said to have surrendered largely on the good faith of those points, including self-determination, freedom of the seas, and a number of things that even I myself have forgotten in the pressure of more important matters.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator want to give Germany some consolation?

Mr. PENROSE. No; but the Senator from Nebraska is deploring the lamentable state Germany will be in under certain conditions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not Germany.

Mr. PENROSE. I am certainly quite as strong on moral obligations as is the Senator from Nebraska. If we owe a moral obligation to Germany, I think it ought to be kept, and, as I understand, her army surrendered on the strength of the 14 points.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania to introduce a modification guaranteeing something additional to Germany. His colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has already done so.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator what has become of the 14 points? Can they be found anywhere?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; they are practically imbedded in the treaty.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, I have been unable to discover a trace of them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can tell the Senator why he has been unable to find that.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator means, perhaps, that they are embalmed or buried in the treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can tell the Senator why he is unable to find them. The Senator from Pennsylvania has been unable to find them, because during the time the treaty has been under examination and debate he has been engaged in a very serious and, as it turned out to be, successful political business in one of the cities in his State.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, the Senator need not throw out a time-honored slur at my occasional absences. [Laughter.] I was better and more usefully employed, I think, than the Senator was during his frequent absences on the golf course and at his handsome summer resort in New England. So far as I am concerned, I have literally not had a day's holiday, Mr. President, unless it be coming in here and listening to speeches, for 10 or 12 years, and the suggestion ill becomes the Senator from Nebraska, for I have noticed on several afternoons when important matters of great moment relating to this treaty were up and inquiry was made as to the Senator from Nebraska, that the response was that he was playing golf. I hope it benefited his health; he may have needed it; but again I ask the Senator where I can find embalmed, buried, or even leaving any geological footprints in the rocks of the treaty, any trace of the 14 points.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am not surprised at the great anxiety of the Senator from Pennsylvania as to the 14 points.

Mr. PENROSE. I had forgotten them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The zeal and ardor with which he supported them and championed them are well remembered here in the Senate, and it is natural therefore that he should be anxious to know at the present time whether they have been vindicated in this treaty. I wish to say to the Senator that, in my opinion, they have been, and I wish to say further that I did not deplore the absence of the Senator in his Pennsylvania contest; in fact, when he returned I congratulated him and congratulated his city upon the victory he had won. So that I hope he will not take my reference to the subject as at all offensive.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, I did not; I keenly appreciated the Senator's interest in good government [laughter]; but considering, Mr. President, that the German Army, supposed to be unequaled in the military history of the world, was led to lay down their arms on the beautiful promises pictured in the 14 points, and, owing to the fact that a great number of matters have perhaps diverted my attention, I should be glad if the Senator would enumerate the 14 points so that they may be put in the RECORD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to assist the Senator, but my judgment is that the time has come to adjourn or to vote. I presume the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana was intended particularly to draw attention, as it has drawn attention, to the very unfair attitude which would be assumed by the Senate if it approves this reservation as drawn. It proposes on behalf of the United States to repudiate, as I have said, any obligation, whereas it leaves all of the nations who have assumed the obligation in an entirely different category. The Senator from Montana no doubt intended his amendment to draw attention strikingly to the fact, as it has done, that, if we are released, the other nations ought to be released.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I had indulged in a violent presumption, such as was voiced by one of my colleagues on this side a few moments ago, to the effect that the Senator from Montana was offering this amendment because he thought that it might benefit the reservation; that he was offering it in good faith, and I had fully determined that I would support it with my vote and if necessary with my voice; but, since the explanation of the Senator from Nebraska, I shall certainly as heartily vote against it, as it is apparent that it is a Jesuitical scheme not intended for any beneficial or good purpose, unless it is simply to open the eyes of somebody to some other iniquity somewhere.

Mr. President, I am also just a little weary of the slush about Poland, Jugo-Slavia, and the other countries to which, it is said, we are under some obligation and to which we must bind ourselves and obligate our children for unknown generations. In this country we said to the Jugo-Slavs and to the Poles that, if they had any patriotism and desire to restore their countries themselves, we would furnish them the money, the means, and the arms to help them, and we did so. We have hog-tied Germany; we have placed her prostrate at their feet, and now we are asked to continue to guard her forever, because, if we assume the correctness of the argument of the Senator, they have not the courage, the patriotism, and the manliness to maintain their own Government, but we should bind the unborn generations of this country to guard the frontiers of Poland and other countries.

The Senator forgets that by an equal obligation, if we adopt this provision as it stands, we shall guard the interests of Chile; that we take from Bolivia and Peru forever and guarantee to guard the stolen Provinces of Tacna, Tarapaca, and Antofagasta. Here upon our own hemisphere we are assuming obligations to guard the lines, to assist in consummating forever the theft of the nitrate fields belonging to Peru and Bolivia.

Mr. President, as I have said, assuming—and I grant that it is a violent assumption—that the amendment was offered in good faith, I had not only intended voting for it but I had suggested to certain colleagues of mine who think about this treaty as I do that we should all vote for it; but with the very lucid, clear, and perfectly understandable explanation of the matter as made by the Senator from Nebraska I shall take equal pleasure now in voting against the amendment. It is evidently a trick, and we are becoming accustomed to tricks.

Mr. KING. I submit a reservation to the pending treaty and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The reservation is as follows:

Suggested reservation to be made a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

That the United States understands that the jurisdiction and authority of the league of nations under articles 1 to 26, inclusive, of the treaty of peace does not include any power over the proper domestic, internal, or national policy of any State a member of the league, and that said articles do not confer upon the league any powers with respect to immigration, imposts, property, inheritance, naturalization, citizenship, labor, coastwise traffic, or any other matter of proper domestic policy, and the United States declares that the enumeration of these matters of policy in this reservation shall not in any wise be construed to limit or restrict the rights of the United States with respect to its national and political powers and sovereignty as recognized by the law and customs of nations; and the United States reserves to itself the exclusive power to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and national sovereignty, and to withhold such questions from submission to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations.

RECESS.

Mr. REED. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he desires to take a recess or adjourn now, or if he proposes to go on?

Mr. LODGE. It is perfectly evident that this debate will run for some time longer. It is now half past 6 o'clock, and I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, November 11, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, November 10, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of liberty, justice, mercy, love, and all that we hold sacred to our hearts, we bow in Thy holy presence and would consecrate ourselves anew to the work whereunto Thou hast called us; thus put our shoulders to the wheels of progress and push toward the higher civilization which waits upon the children of men and leave behind us a record worthy of emulation; receive Thy benediction, under the spiritual leadership of the Jesus of Nazareth, the Holy One of Israel, the Savior of mankind. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, November 8, 1919, was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF REPRESENTATIVE WEBB.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., November 9, 1919.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to inform you that I have tendered to the governor of North Carolina my resignation as Representative in this Congress from the ninth North Carolina district, to be effective on Monday, the 10th of November, 1919.

I am, with great respect,
Cordially, yours, E. Y. WEBB.

REQUEST TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CONNALLY. To make a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I request that on to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on a nonpolitical subject, the anniversary of the armistice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, he be allowed to address the House for 30 minutes on a nonpolitical subject.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we hope and expect to take up the railroad bill under a rule to-morrow. Under those circumstances I do not believe it would be proper to give anyone the privilege to address the House for 30 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. To-morrow is the anniversary of the armistice, and I only desire to submit a few remarks.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is a very important anniversary, but the most important thing before the Congress to-day is the railroad bill. We hope to take that up to-morrow and begin the discussion of it at an early hour. Under those circumstances I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 6951. An act authorizing the return to the sender or the forwarding of undeliverable second, third, and fourth class mail matter; and

H. R. 10208. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. McLEAN, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. OWEN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE CASE OF VICTOR L. BERGER.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the special committee appointed under House resolution No. 6, I call up at this time Report 413, being No. 91 on the House Calendar, and submit the following privileged resolution:

Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances of this case, Victor L. Berger is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the fifth congressional district of the State of Wisconsin or to hold a seat therein as such Representative.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman must call up the resolution rather than the report, must he not?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman present a resolution?

Mr. DALLINGER. I call up the report which recommends the adoption of the resolution printed in the report. I call up the case.

Mr. BLANTON. The point of order I made is that the gentleman should call up the resolution and not the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that he thinks the proper course would be to present a resolution, but of course the report contains the resolution. According to the gentleman's suggestion the vote would be on the adoption of the report.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, is not the proper procedure to call up the case of Victor L. Berger and present a resolution?

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair would think.

Mr. DALLINGER. I desire to say that the parliamentary clerk informed me that the proper procedure was to call up the report.

The SPEAKER. And present a resolution.

Mr. DALLINGER. And present a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not wish the report read, does he?

Mr. DALLINGER. I ask to have the resolution read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts presents a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances of this case, Victor L. Berger is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the fifth congressional district of the State of Wisconsin or to hold a seat therein as such Representative.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I want to see if we can agree upon time for debate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Has this resolution been introduced in the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has just introduced it.

Mr. BLANTON. He has introduced it out of the report, I understand.

The SPEAKER. He has introduced it.

Mr. BLANTON. That is an introduction of it?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Has the resolution been printed?

The SPEAKER. It has been printed in the report.

Mr. DALLINGER. It has been printed in the report, as has always been customary in election cases.

Mr. DYER. I understand from the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is the first information that the House has that there is such a report of such a resolution.

Mr. DALLINGER. It has been printed in the report.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if this is not the usual procedure in such cases?

Mr. DALLINGER. This is exactly the procedure that has always been taken in contested-election cases. The case is called up by the chairman on the report, and the resolution is incorporated in the report, and no separate resolution is printed. The resolution is now offered by the committee, and I move its adoption.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to remark that the gentleman from Massachusetts is pursuing the usual and ordinary course in election cases. I recall a number of contested-election cases brought up in this House, and the procedure has always been for the Committee on Elections to call up the resolution embodied in the report, to call up the case, it being before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate upon this resolution——

Mr. DYER. Pending that request——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to make his request first?

Mr. DYER. I desire to raise the question of consideration. I think we ought to go into the consideration of the railroad bill, and not take up the time with this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri raises the question of consideration. The question is, Will the House consider the resolution?

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DYER) there were—ayes 107, noes 2.

Accordingly the House determined to consider the resolution.

Mr. DALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon the adoption of this report and the resolution incorporated therein be limited to five hours, one hour to be given to Victor L. Berger and the remainder to be divided between the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to five hours, one hour of which shall be controlled by Mr. Berger and the other four hours to be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE]. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, that would prevent the vote on the resolution to-day. There would be five hours of general debate and then further discussion. I object to five hours of general debate.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that debate be limited to five hours, to be controlled as I suggested, and at the end of that time the previous question be ordered.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Does the gentleman's motion carry with it an apportionment of the time as he just suggested?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes; I make the motion that the debate be limited to five hours, one hour to be accorded to Mr. Berger, and two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] and two hours by myself.

Mr. RUCKER. I will say, as a matter of fairness, I think Mr. Berger ought to have ample time to present his case to the House. I have an intimation that he would like to have an hour and a half.

Mr. DALLINGER. There are members of the committee, without taking into consideration other Members, who wish to speak, who would like to have more time than the amount that I have asked for. It was thought that Mr. Berger should not have more time than any member of the committee.

Mr. RUCKER. I will say to the gentleman that I expect to vote for the adoption of his resolution, but I think the gentleman from Wisconsin ought to have time in which to present his case, even if the members of the committee do not have as much time as they want. I think the gentleman ought to have ample time to present his case to the House. Does not the gentleman think that he ought to modify his request?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The time to be consumed by the committee will all be on one side. I do not mean on one side of the aisle but upon one side of the question.

Mr. DALLINGER. I understand that the gentleman from Texas and myself would be glad to yield some time to those who are opposed to the report.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Berger is opposed to the report, of course. Under the gentleman's motion four hours would be controlled in favor of the report and one hour opposed to the report, and that would not be an equitable arrangement. If the gentleman from Wisconsin wants an hour and a half, why not let him have it and the committee take three hours and a half.

Mr. DYER. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts has asked that he and the gentleman from Texas control four hours of the time, and they are both in favor of the resolution.

Mr. DALLINGER. I stated that we would yield time to those opposed to the report.

Mr. DYER. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], a member of the committee, is opposed to the resolution, but he is not here, and apparently no one is to be given time who is opposed to the resolution.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, if there is no objection I will ask unanimous consent to modify my motion, and I move that debate be closed at the end of five and one-half hours, one hour and a half of which is to be given to Mr. Berger and the rest of the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Texas and one-half by myself.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask or incorporate in his motion that the gentleman from Wisconsin shall control one half of the time and the members of the committee the other half. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to at least half of the time, so that he may yield to those who support his position. We do not know whether they will get any time under this motion.

Mr. DALLINGER. I think the motion is fair, with the explanation I have made.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman stated that it was his intention to yield time to those opposed to the resolution.

Mr. DALLINGER. A reasonable time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not know that anybody is opposed to the report except the gentleman from Wisconsin; would the gentleman from Massachusetts yield him further time?

Mr. DALLINGER. I think the motion I have made is a fair one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to modify his motion, and moves that the time for general debate be limited to five and one-half hours, one hour and a half of which will be given to Mr. Berger and the remaining time to be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, and I will object unless half of the time is to be controlled by Mr. Berger——

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on my motion.

Mr. KEARNS. What is the motion upon?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that all debate be limited to five and a half hours, one hour and a half to be given to Mr. Berger and the remainder to be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas, and he moves the previous question.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is not the gentleman asking unanimous consent, and the question is whether unanimous consent shall be granted, and should be stated by the Chair pending the motion for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated the question of unanimous consent, but that was objected to. The gentleman from Massachusetts then offered his motion and moved the previous question. The question is on adopting the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DYER) there were 126 ayes and 1 no.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present, and the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 280, nays 1, answered "present" 3, not voting 147, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Berger case debate be limited to five and a half hours; that Mr. Berger may address the House for an hour and a half and the other four hours to be controlled half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] and half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE], and at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker—— [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, this report, with the accompanying resolution, which is now before the House recommending that Victor Berger is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the fifth congressional district of the State of Wisconsin or to hold a seat therein as such Representative, is the unanimous report of the special committee appointed under House resolution No. 6 [applause], except for the fact that Mr. RODENBERG, of Illinois, who was not present when the final vote in the committee took place, requested me as chairman to file a statement from him, stating that he withheld his approval from this report and stating that he did not believe the House should consider this report at the present session of Congress, and that action by the House should be postponed until after final decision of the court in the case of the United States against Victor L. Berger et al., which is now pending in the United States circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit. The other members of the committee do not concur in this opinion and believe that this matter should be acted upon here and now. [Applause.]

In order that you may understand the position of the committee I want to briefly state the procedure adopted by the committee immediately after its appointment. You will remember that the first day of this session it fell to me to object to the swearing in of Victor L. Berger, a Member elect from the fifth congressional district of Wisconsin, and a resolution was unanimously adopted at that time by this House stating that, whereas I had made such objection relying upon public records and papers, the whole matter of Mr. Berger's eligibility should be referred to a special committee of nine Members. The public records referred to consisted of the record of the trial of the case of the United States against Victor L. Berger et al. at Chicago last December and in January of the present year; and a certified copy of the record in the circuit court of appeals of the District of Columbia in the proceeding when the second-class mailing privilege of the Milwaukee Leader, Mr. Berger's paper, was revoked.

Now, at the first meeting of the committee, the committee being appointed on May 21, the whole question was discussed. There were two courses open to the committee. One was to rely upon the naked conviction at Chicago, in the case just referred to—the fact that a United States jury had convicted Mr. Berger for a violation of the espionage law and a United States judge had sentenced him to 20 years in the penitentiary. If such a course had been taken, there would have been no necessity for any hearings before your committee. All the committee would have had to do would be to have brought in a report showing the record of the conviction and sentence and recommending that Victor L. Berger be not allowed to take the oath at the present time and that his final right to the seat be suspended until the court should finally decide. Your committee, however, unanimously decided that it would not rely upon the conviction in Chicago of a violation of that particular United States statute, but that your committee, having before it as a part of its proceedings the entire record of the case at Chicago, the record of the case in the District of Columbia relating to the Milwaukee Leader, the testimony in the case of the contested-election case of Carney against Berger, which was referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1, and in addition all the testimony brought before your committee by Mr. Berger and his counsel, should determine whether or not Victor L. Berger is a fit man to be sworn in as a Representative in this Congress and whether or not he is eligible to membership in this House.

You will remember on the first day of the present session, in moving the adoption of House resolution No. 6, that I promised that Mr. Berger would be given a full, fair, and complete hearing before the committee. I am glad to be able to say to-day in the presence of this House, in behalf of the other members of the committee and myself, that the promise then made has been absolutely and faithfully kept. Hearings were commenced on June 11 and 12, and then a postponement was granted in order that Mr. Berger and his counsel might have further time to prepare the case. Hearings were resumed on July 21 and continued every day for two weeks, morning and afternoon, and on one or two occasions in the evening, until Mr. Berger and his counsel admitted that they had presented everything to the committee that they desired. Then six weeks were allowed him and his counsel to prepare their final argument. Your committee has had the matter under advisement since September 15 until October 24, when the report now under consideration was filed.

Now, just a word, because my time is limited, in regard to the facts in this case. You will remember that in February, 1917, diplomatic relations between the United States and Germany were broken off; that in March the President of the United States called a special session of Congress, which met on April 2, and on April 6 Congress passed a joint resolution declaring the existence of a state of war between this country and the Imperial German Government. At that time Victor L. Berger was a member of the national executive committee of the Socialist Party and was editor in chief of the Milwaukee Leader. Associated with him on the national executive committee, which consisted of five members, according to the testimony, were Adolph Germer, who was national secretary of the Socialist Party, and John M. Work, an editorial writer upon Mr. Berger's paper, the Milwaukee Leader.

Against the protest of John Spargo, of Vermont, a member of that national executive committee, this executive committee, of which Mr. Berger was the moving spirit, called an emergency national convention of the Socialist Party, which convened at St. Louis on April 7, the day after this country had declared war. At that time William F. Kruse was the head of the Young People's Socialist League, and J. Louis Engdahl was the editor of the American Socialist, which was the official organ of the Socialist Party, and the title to which was in this same executive committee, of which Victor L. Berger was the moving spirit, and Irwin St. John Tucker was circulation manager of the American Socialist and was in charge of the publicity bureau at national headquarters, at 803 West Madison Street, Chicago; and, though Mr. Berger lived in Milwaukee, the testimony shows that he was in constant touch, by personal visits, telephone messages, and by correspondence, with these other men. Now, Mr. Berger was the oldest of these men, 20 or 25 years older than the other five, including Mr. Work.

He was the man that was the recognized leader of the Socialist Party of this country. He had been repeatedly sent as a delegate to international conferences of the Socialist Party, and the testimony shows at those conferences Nicolai Lenin, now well known as the head of the Bolshevist government in Russia, was a delegate representing the Russian Socialists, although he lived in Switzerland at the time.

There was no legitimate object in calling a convention of the Socialist Party in April, 1917. The Socialist Party was an American political party. The other political parties were to have no national convention until 1920. John Spargo objected to calling this emergency convention, because the underlying purpose of calling that convention was to prevent this country from going into the war and from successfully prosecuting it in case the country should go to war. And yet that convention was called, and it met at St. Louis on April 7. War had been declared. It was the duty of every loyal American citizen to stand behind the United States of America. [Applause.]

A committee was appointed by the Socialist convention, on war and militarism, to draft a platform, and the moving spirit was Victor L. Berger, the recognized leader of the Socialist Party. He had an opportunity, and those men in this conspiracy with him had an opportunity, to make the American Socialist Party a patriotic party, as had been the case in all the other belligerent countries. The German Socialist Party stood by their Government; the English Socialist Party stood by their Government; and John Spargo, a delegate from Vermont, tried to get that convention at St. Louis to vote down the report from Mr. Berger's committee and adopt another report. You will find reference to the Spargo resolutions on page 4 of the committee's report—what Spargo wanted to have that convention adopt. Just let me read a word. That report says in the closing paragraph:

> Now that the war is an accomplished fact, for the reason stated we hold that it is our socialist duty to make whatever sacrifices may be necessary to enable our Nation and its allies to win the war as speedily as possible.

That was the sort of attitude the other Socialist parties had taken. But that was voted down, and Mr. Spargo and his associates were expelled from the Socialist Party later, and a platform was adopted which the late lamented Theodore Roosevelt, in a letter to Mr. GOLDFOGLE, a Member of this House, said was "treason against the United States." And that platform was circulated by the hundreds of thousands and millions throughout the country, and the circulation of that platform had no other purpose except to obstruct, hinder, and embarrass the Government of the United States in the prosecution of the war. Then took place an organized propaganda, through the Milwaukee Leader, Mr. Berger's paper; the American Socialist, the official organ of the Socialist Party; the Young People's Socialist League; and through public meetings, the object of which, as you can read between the lines, was not only to hinder and obstruct the Government of the United States but, if possible, to cause an armed outbreak throughout the country.

Now, Mr. Berger will tell you that he believes in obedience to law. He knew that if he told, either through a published vote of his executive committee or by word of mouth, a single one of the young Socialists of draft age not to register under the draft law that he would be liable, under the espionage act, to fine and imprisonment. What did he do? The executive committee, at a meeting at which he was present and voted, passed a vote that when these young Socialists came to inquire what they should do in regard to registration they should be referred to the St. Louis platform and "Proclamation and war program" to which I have referred. And what does that platform say? Mr. Berger tries to explain now that he believes in obedience to law. He was asked before our committee to point out one thing in that war program that even suggested obedience to law. Throughout it breathes disobedience to law and resistance to the Government. Listen:

> We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world. They—> have been plunged into this war by the trickery and treachery of the ruling class of the country through its representatives in the national administration and National Congress.

Referring to the people—

In other words, this body of men, to which you and I, fellow Members of this House, are proud to belong, are a crowd of criminals and traitors, and I can not understand why Victor L. Berger should want to come here and sit as a Member of this House with us.

With that war program was a platform advocating resistance to conscription and repudiation of war debts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish I had time to read to you, and I wish that the Members of the House had time to read, some of these things that were published and circulated among the men who were called to the colors and their families. It is hard to conceive all the insidious and malicious venom that came from the pens of these conspirators against their Government, inspired, as every Member of this House will say after he has read them, by hatred of this Government and its institutions.

On page 5 of the report we refer to a few of these passages. On page 148 of volume 2 of the hearings is an article headed "Women and war." Just to give you some idea of this insidious propaganda, I want to read it to you. It was in the American Socialist of April 14, 1917, title to which was in the national executive committee, of which Victor L. Berger was the moving spirit. It says:

> A kindly, learned gentleman of "Old Virginia" saw two women trying to induce a young lad to enlist. "I don't very often feel like hitting women with a baseball bat," he said in relating the incident, "but I did then." He was an ex-Confederate veteran.

What an insult that was to the loyalty of the Confederate veterans of this country.

> He knew what war was. An ardent pacifist, the action of the women seemed despicable in his eyes.
> And the action was despicable. Women soliciting for such a purpose are only a step higher than women who solicit for the sale of their bodies; and, in fact, the latter deserve only deepest compassion, while the former are entitled only to contempt. Such women are unworthy of their sex.

And then it ends up:

> "Lips that touch liquor shall never touch mine" is the burden of an old temperance song. "Hands that hold guns shall never hold mine" should be the new version.
> Sentimental? Yes; but sensible nevertheless. It would work.

Yes, according to these conspirators, it would work to prevent the young men of this country from enlisting to fight for the Stars and Stripes against Germany.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to leave the question of fact right here. Other members of the committee will enlarge upon the record and call your attention to the other phases of this conspiracy; and when you have heard the story from our report, and from the testimony, and from the members of this committee you will understand why it was that the Department of Justice of the United States considered this man, who comes here and asks for admission to this House of Representatives, as one of the most dangerous men in the United States, because he was the head and front of this organized conspiracy to prevent this Government from winning the war.

Now, just a word about the law and precedents in the case. The counsel for Mr. Berger came before us and contended that this House has no right to prevent Mr. Berger from taking the oath of office; that because he came here, shown by the returns to have been elected by the people of the fifth district of Wisconsin, with a certificate from the governor of the State, 25 years old, 7 years a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of the State of Wisconsin, this House must seat him. I asked Mr. Cochems, counsel for Mr. Berger, this question. I said, "Suppose that a man had actually taken arms against the United States and had actually taken part in killing soldiers of this country and officials of this Government, and later on, having escaped, returned to this country and was elected by a constituency and asked admission to this House. Is it your contention that this House could not exclude him?" He said, "Yes; that is just what I mean."

Why, Mr. Speaker, we have here an unbroken line of precedents supporting our action. But I want to say, even before I refer to them, that if there was not a single precedent, if the matter had never come up, now would be the time, and this the place, for this House to make a new precedent. [Applause.]

The men who framed our Constitution in 1787 never had the faintest idea that any constituency in this country would deliberately and intentionally choose as a Representative in the Congress of the United States a man who, when the country was at war, fighting for its existence—because counsel for Mr. Berger admitted before our committee that he believed that if England and France had been annihilated our turn would have come next—I say, if they had had any idea that any constituency would choose a man who had done everything he could do to destroy the Government, they would have undoubtedly placed an express provision in the Constitution making such a thing impossible. But there is an unbroken line of precedents in this House. This House has excluded men for various reasons and has always insisted upon its right to exclude. An ingenious plea was made by counsel in this case, as it was made in the Roberts case, that we have no right to exclude a Member elect, but that it is our duty to admit him, no matter what he has done, let him take the oath of office, and then expel him.

What are the facts? You have on one side an unbroken line of precedents that the House has the right to exclude, and has repeatedly exercised that right. On the other hand you have an equally unbroken line of precedents to the effect that neither House of Congress has ever expelled a man for anything that he did before his election.

If you will refer to the Constitution, you will observe that the power to expel is found in the paragraph conferring upon each House the power to adopt rules for the conduct of its proceedings and punish its Members for disorderly behavior. I have not time to read it; my time is passing and others desire to address the House. But you will notice in our report a decision by Speaker CANNON, in which he quotes a decision by Speaker Carlisle, to the effect that neither House has ever expelled or punished a Member under that provision of the Constitution for anything that happened previous to his election. So that the only way that this House can act on a question of this kind is to exclude.

Now, it has been said that what was done on the first day of the session and what is proposed to do now is an unusual and extraordinary thing. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is nothing of the kind. After the Civil War, when the first cases of disloyalty came up, and men came here who had given aid or comfort to the enemy, or who had even fought against the Government, the matter came up, and what did Congress do? In 1862 Congress passed a test-oath act, providing that no man should be seated here unless he first took an oath that he had given no aid, comfort, counsel, or encouragement to the enemies of the country. Not satisfied with that, when in 1867 the whole Kentucky delegation presented itself on this floor to take the oath of office, even although they were ready and willing to take the test oath, this House said, "No; we will not let you take the oath." The whole matter was referred to the Committee on Elections for consideration. The committee reported that four of the Members elect from Kentucky had been loyal during the war, and they were allowed to take their seats. The other cases were referred to subcommittees, and in those other cases, particularly in the cases of Smith against Brown and McKee against Young, the House voted that the Members elect should not be allowed to take the oath and take their seats. The same precedent was followed here in the comparatively recent case of Brigham H. Roberts, Representative elect from Utah, although in this case there was no charge of disloyalty. In short, the House has always insisted on its right to exclude, and has also insisted that it had no right to expel a Member for any conduct of his previous to his election.

Now, I want, in closing, to call your attention to just this point, that this case, instead of being a weaker case, is a vastly stronger case than the Roberts case or than any of the preceding cases. It is true that the House has always insisted upon its right to exclude for various reasons, but there has always been a minority in the House that has contended that the House had no right—no moral right—to add to the qualifications of membership prescribed in the Constitution.

But never has a minority, either in the Roberts case or in any other case, contended that the House did not have the legal right to exclude, provided the Member elect did not possess the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution. And in this case, Mr. Speaker, the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, section 3, adds a fourth qualification for membership in Congress to those contained in the original Constitution. Section 3 of the fourteenth amendment provides that—

> No person shall be a Senator or Representaive in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a Member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Now, gentlemen of the House, in this case your committee is convinced by the testimony, in fact by the admitted testimony, that this man, Victor L. Berger, did give aid and comfort to the enemies of this country during this Great War, so that, even according to the minority in these previous cases, it is not only the right but it is the duty of this House to exclude him. [Applause.]

Just one final word in conclusion. This is the first case of disloyalty that has come up before the Congress since the days of the Civil War, because so far as we know there was no disloyalty in the Spanish War. In the cases arising during and after the Civil War—and I speak as a northern man inheriting northern prejudices, but as a student of history—there is this to be said: Down to the Civil War there was an honest difference of opinion in regard to the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] There was an honest difference on the question of National and State sovereignty, and those men who fought against the United States of America in the Civil War did it because they believed that after their States had called a convention and had rescinded the original vote by which these States had ratified the Constitution of the United States, their duty was to follow their States, honestly believing that they owed the State their primary allegiance. [Applause.] But here we have no such case. There was no room for any honest difference of opinion. No matter what Mr. Berger may have done before this war started—and he had a perfect right, as one born in Austria, to sympathize with the Central Powers before we went into the war, just the same as some of the rest of us, because of our ancestry, had a right to sympathize with England or with France—when this country made its decision and went into this war, it was the duty of every American citizen to loyally support the Government of the United States in the prosecution of the war. [Applause.]

Mr. Berger not only refused to do it, but, as I have said and as the evidence shows, he was the head and front of an organized conspiracy to hinder, obstruct, and embarrass the Government, and, if possible, to prevent its winning the war, so that the German military autocracy might annihilate France and England and then come across here and destroy democracy in this hemisphere. Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Members of this House as American citizens not to admit this man. We do not care what his political or religious or economic beliefs are. Do not be misled. He came here before as a Socialist and was admitted. Myer London was admitted to this House as a Socialist. The American people do not care what a man's political, religious, or economic beliefs are, but they do care whether he is a loyal American. They demand that we make that requirement of every man seeking admission here, and they will be satisfied with nothing less. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute of my time to my colleague [Mr. BRINSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRINSON] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BRINSON. Mr. Speaker, I think all Americans are proud of the achievements of the world's most famous, most skillful, and most successful aviator. I have special pride in him because he is a constituent of mine. I have asked him to come here to-day, and he at present occupies a seat in the Speaker's gallery, Rev. Belvin W. Maynard, the winner of the recent transcontinental air race. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, under the agreement Mr. Berger is to be recognized for one hour.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Berger has an hour and a half.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, on the advice of my lawyers I will have to read my speech.

I am well aware that any speech I may make here will be absolutely wasted as far as its effect upon the result of the vote is concerned. No arguments of mine can change the decision of this House. [Applause.]

ASKING FOR FAIR PLAY.

Nevertheless, I consider it my duty to make a statement so that the country at large—and those who are willing to read and to learn—may be informed on the true position of the American Socialist Party in the late war, and also on the causes that may bring about the downfall of the representative form of government through the action of its capitalist representatives.

For the reasons given, and as a matter of fair play toward an opponent who has always been fair toward you, I ask you to lay aside, at least for a little while, all prejudice against Socialists, and especially against Socialists of German descent, and give close attention to what I have to say.

I beg you to overlook my German accent, for which I am not responsible, but to overlook nothing else.

Now, I am in all sorts of troubles, gentlemen, on account of the well-known position of the Socialists all over the world against all commercial and militaristic war.

Now, it is true that the American Socialist Party, or at least the overwhelming majority of the American Socialist Party, was opposed to the entrance of our country into the World War. And it is also true that the party has never recanted that position.

The reason for our opposition is simple. Students of history and political economy as the Socialists usually are, they could foresee the results of this war for this country.

SOCIALIST PREDICTION PROVED CORRECT.

In many proclamations since the World War began we foretold that if this country should enter the war it would have to spend untold treasure and sacrifice 100,000 lives, and that instead of accomplishing anything for the betterment of our people, the outcome of the war would simply strengthen reaction, exploitation, and plutocracy. Nobody will deny that this prediction was correct.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BERGER. Not just now. I will have some time at the end of my speech, and I will gladly answer any questions. You see, you can ask the questions then with a better understanding of our position after I get through.

To begin with, the war was based on lies in Europe. And so were our people driven into this war by years of continual and systematic lying. This campaign of falsehoods was continued during the war. And is still continuing.

PROPAGANDA OF FALSEHOODS.

Long before our entrance into the war there was a constant propaganda of misrepresentation and untruth to create fear in the hearts of our people. There were at first innumerable newspaper articles, photo plays, and bill posters to bring about preparedness and get people accustomed to the idea of war. And after we were prepared the rest naturally followed.

COST OF WAR.

During the war we were deceived as to the number of American casualties. Our ruling officials started with 40,000 and added from time to time until it became 60,000 at the end of the war. And now since the war is over, the official returns tell us that 115,000 lost their lives and that 200,000 more were injured.

We find the same habit of misstatements as to the appropriations made in Congress on account of the war. We were told just lately that the war cost us about $23,000,000,000.

But the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress recently (C. D. Blackly, Sept. 22, 1919) made the following statement respecting America's share in the cost of the war:

APPROPRIATIONS MADE BY CONGRESS ON ACCOUNT OF THE WAR WITH EUROPE.

Secretary of the Treasury Glass in a letter dated July 9, 1919, to the House Committee on Ways and Means, has discussed United States war expenditures and estimated the same by adding total expenditures of United States Government for war period, and subtracting therefrom what he estimates the United States would have spent on a normal peace basis. This he places at $1,000,000,000 annually. If, therefore, from the total annual appropriations there were subtracted $1,000,000,000 for each year, the remainder will approximate what, according to the method of calculation of the Secretary, may be considered as appropriations chargeable to the war:

Total appropriations by Congress for fiscal years 1917–1920.

Source of information.	Year.	Amount.
United States Treasury Department, Digest of Appropriations, 1917, p. 542	1917	$1,628,411,644.81
United States Treasury Department, Digest of Appropriations, 1918, p. 603	1918	18,881,949,243.79
Statement of Mr. Warren, Cong. Rec., July 10, 1919, p. 2334	1919	[1] 27,092,094,720.75
Statement of Mr. Good, Cong. Rec., Sept. 16, 1919, p. 5870	1920	7,345,617,283.58
		54,948,063,892.93

[1] Includes $3,000,000,000 for loans to Allies.

In round numbers this amounts to $55,000,000,000. To this sum should be added $3,000,000,000 more for war expenses of the present fiscal year.

Some might say, of course, that from that sum we should subtract $4,000,000,000 for the normal expenses of the country for 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, and also the $3,000,000,000 loan to the Allies.

Even so the total cost of the war, as far as our country is concerned, would then be $51,000,000,000, or more than $500 for every man, woman, and child in the United States.

In order to get at the real figures, however, we must add to this amount $10,000,000,000 which we have given to the Allies as a loan, which would make the total cost $61,000,000,000, or more than $600 for every man, woman, and child in the United States.

A Chicago weekly newspaper, the Republican, which reprints these figures—the average big daily does not—adds, very pertinently:

This, too, represents only the direct cost of the war in dollars and cents. It does not include the indirect cost caused by the enormous increase in the cost of living. Five hundred dollars per year per person, or $1,250, is not an extravagant estimate of the increased cost of living since we entered the war 2½ years ago.

WHY PROFITEERS FAVORED WAR.

We understand, of course, why the capitalist press and the representatives and tools of the corporations and of the profiteers of our country ignore all these figures.

This was a profiteers' war—if there ever was one.

For 1917 alone war profits as high as 3,000 per cent—$30 of annual profit for every dollar invested—are recorded in the income-tax reports for 1917 filed with the Government by certain corporations.

Profits of 100 per cent on cash invested were common.

Mr. Amos Pinchot, a wealthy man but an honest man, compiled this from the companies' own annual reports, showing that 287 corporations alone during the war year of 1917 made a net income of $2,590,307,206. Mr. Pinchot did not publish any figures for the year 1918.

Deducting from the 1917 net profits of the corporations that existed before the war the net prewar earnings for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, which were the most prosperous for these corporations ever known until the war, the excess war profits of fewer than 300 corporations amounted to $1,559,331,731. The profits for 1918 undoubtedly were at least as large, if not larger, but I have not the figures.

The figures were taken from the reports of these companies for the income-tax commission. Nobody will claim that any of these companies reported higher profits for taxation than they were compelled to report. On the contrary, all kinds of profits were hidden in every possible way, but the bulk could not be hidden.

SOME WAR PROFITS.

To quote just two instances:

The profits of the Du Pont Powder Works before the war were about $5,000,000 a year. The same corporation in 1915, 1916, and 1917 averaged net profits of more than a million dollars a week.

Before the war, during the three most profitable years of its existence, the Steel Corporation averaged a net profit of $63,000,000 per year. In 1917 alone the corporation made $457,000,000, or an excess war profit of more than a million dollars every day. I have no figures for 1918. But with such earnings it is clear that Judge Elbert H. Gary naturally would frown on any attempt to start a union which would make him at least divide with his workingmen.

And everybody will understand why our plutocrats are so touchy when anybody mentions the word "profiteer."

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I understand the gentleman is given an hour and a half to speak in his own defense.

Mr. BERGER. I am.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I make the point of order that he is not doing it.

Mr. BERGER. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I have to make my defense in my own way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been able to understand a great deal that the gentleman has said, because his back is turned to the Chair, but the Chair has not observed anything that would not be in order.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. He is stating what he thinks is the cause of the war.

The SPEAKER. For the present, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BERGER. I thank you. These figures were taken from the reports of these companies made to the income-tax commission.

Mr. MADDEN. Do the gentleman's figures include the deduction that should be made for the 80 per cent tax paid into the Treasury?

WHAT HAVE WE GAINED?

Mr. BERGER. Yes. And what has America gained in this war by this war? We have lost our liberties and have gained imperialism.

We have wasted and squandered billions of dollars which the working people are supposed to pay, partly in direct taxation and partly in indirect taxes through the high cost of living. I say the working people, because, after all, the farmers and the workers in the factories, mines, and railroads—the men who toil with brain and brawn for a living—will have to pay this debt unless it is repudiated some day.

Such have been the results of the war, as we Socialists have predicted over and over again.

On the economic field we have gained nothing that could not have been gained more readily if we had remained out of it.

What have we gained by this war except a condition which makes it almost impossible for the average workingman or clerk to feed and clothe his family, even half decently?

THE SHRUNKEN DOLLAR.

What have we gained by this war other than a shrunken dollar and a diminished buying power, due to the fact that billions upon billions of paper money and bonds have been issued by the Government? It is due to this superabundance of paper money and the shrinkage of the value of the dollar that the buying power of the wages of the workingmen, which went down 10 per cent from 1910 to 1912, has declined again more than twice as much from 1913 to 1919.

Over 71,000,000 people do not own their homes. Rents have gone up 50 per cent, and in some cases 100 per cent. Most of these people are on the verge of pauperism all the time. They can not purchase their supplies in large lots and take advantage of any temporary lower prices. They must buy their groceries and their coal in the smallest possible quantities, at top-notch figures, from day to day.

Nor is the farmer better off on account of our entrance into the war. Of course, he is guaranteed a certain top price for wheat just now, but his expenses of production have gone up in proportion, and sometimes even more so. As a matter of fact, he is compelled to spend his supposed war gain in higher prices of machinery and clothing.

The worst off is the city worker, including the clerk and the office man—the white-collared proletarian who is too proud to organize.

HAS NOT HELPED THE WORKERS.

Organization, however, has helped the American workingmen only very little so far, because the plutocrats and profiteers have always found ways and means to either buy off or cajole the labor leaders with fine phrases and, in some cases, also with more substantial rewards.

We are so far in America that the Regular Army is being used to disperse peaceful assemblages of steel strikers at Gary, Ind., and that the Cossacks of the Steel Trust are riding down and terrorizing the steel strikers in Pennsylvania, because they might interfere with the immense profits of the Steel Trust. America has taken the place of Czarist Russia not only in the war but even after the war.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think the privileges of the House in debate, even though a man is being tried for his position here on the floor, ought to authorize a condemnation of the institutions of a man's own Government in a crucial hour, such as now exists, and I make the point of order that the gentleman's remarks are out of order when he denounces the Government of the United States in its effort to uphold and enforce the law of this country at this time.

The SPEAKER. As far as the Chair has been able to understand him, the Chair thinks the gentleman is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is condemning the sending of United States troops to Gary, to maintain law and order there.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair stated before, the gentleman's back being turned to the Chair, and he having a very strong foreign accent, it has been difficult for the Chair to understand all that he has said, but the Chair understands, the gentleman being accused of unpatriotic conduct, that his argument is in the nature of a plea of confession and avoidance, that he is giving reasons why he should not support the Government; and whereas the weight of that argument is to be considered by the House, the Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Just one sentence, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman is asking that he be permitted to take the oath of office as a Representative of this Government, which oath binds him to uphold the Government and the flag of the United States. When he is asking that he be allowed to take the oath of office, is he to be permitted to condemn that Government and to argue here that he should not support the Government which he has asked to represent?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that that is a question for the gentleman who is arguing to decide upon. Whether it would be an efficacious argument or not is another question. It seems to the Chair that inasmuch as the gentleman is charged with being unpatriotic, he has a right to claim or admit that he was unpatriotic and give his reasons therefor. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Would it be proper at the end of the remarks of the gentleman to move to strike them from the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would.

TO USE THE REGULAR TROOPS.

Mr. BERGER. Incidentally I will say that not even the Kaiser in Germany, at the height of his power, ever dared to use regular troops against strikers; in our country, however, they will not only use them to protect scabs, but they intend to run the mines and the railroads, if necessary, with regular troops. That is why we have won the war "to make the world safe for democracy" and to abolish "militarism everywhere and forever."

THE RIGHTS OF LABOR IN QUESTION NOW.

But there is our President, Woodrow Wilson, the sacro-sanct. Mr. Wilson has coined more democratic phrases than all the Presidents of the United States combined, and he has taken away more of our liberties than all of the Presidents of the United States combined. He is on especially good terms with Sam Gompers, James Duncan, and Frank Morrison, officials of the American Federation of Labor. With the help of these gentlemen—all of whom, by the way, were born under the British flag—he has gloriously fought this war which is to end by giving Great Britain six votes in the league of nations to our one.

But did this victory help the working people, and where?

Before the war it was an axiom in every civilized country that a man had a right to stop work individually or in company with his fellow workers. That man had a right to make an agreement with his employer, either individually or collectively, in company with his fellow workers. That he had a right to select such delegates or agents to make an agreement for him as were calculated to bring the best results for himself and his fellow workers.

All this is gone now, and legislation is pending to make a strike a crime in the so-called basic industries.

WAGE SLAVERY.

Compulsory work means slavery, of course, but that does not matter. Our ruling class evidently thinks this is the time that our workingmen need to be told they are wage slaves in name—as they always were in fact. This is why we won the war—to make the world safe for democracy.

And this happens while Mr. Woodrow Wilson has sanctimoniously invited representatives of the employers, of the workingmen, and of the public to meet in an industrial conference in Washington to settle all the woes and ills of industry.

And Woodrow Wilson naturally has invited the employers to represent the employing class.

And he delegated his friend Sam Gompers, the trusted agent of the trusts, to designate the professional labor leaders that were to represent the working class.

Woodrow Wilson, however, also appointed a number of men to represent the public; that is, the men who were supposed not to be wageworkers, represented directly in the unions, nor employers represented in the opposite group. And behold! whom did he select?

"REPRESENTING" THE PUBLIC.

Among those invited and specially selected to "represent the public interest" in this conference are Rockefeller (Standard Oil); Gary (Steel Trust); Brookings (Union Trust Co.); Chadbourne (Railroads); Dawes (Central Trust Co.); Burgess (National Banks); Galloway (Cotton Trust); Endicott (United Shoe Machinery, Smelting Trust, etc.); Feiss (Clothing Trust); Gay (editor Morgan-owned paper); James (manufactures and banks); Jones (New Jersey Zinc Trust); Landon (American Radiator Trust); Meredith (United States Chamber of Commerce); McNabb (known in San Francisco as McScab); Sweet (beet sugar); Titus (oil); and Baruch, the blessed one of Wall Street, not to mention the Socialist renegades, Russell and Spargo.

J. Pierpont Morgan is not in this list, that is true; but Mr. Morgan just now is representing "us" in Europe. Nevertheless, with the help of Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Gary and the other gentlemen that Mr. Wilson appointed to represent "the public," Mr. Morgan's interests will not be neglected.

"ABOLISHING MILITARISM."

We were told that this war was fought "to abolish militarism in the world forever." At the same time, our War Department, which is headed by that ex-pacifist and ex-reformer, Newton D. Baker, demands a standing Army of 584,000 men, which is more than the Kaiser ever had until shortly before the outbreak of the World War.

I was opposed to conscription because—though it was politely called the "selective draft act"—it was undoubtedly an enforced draft on the manhood of the Nation, without any vote of the people having been taken.

ALWAYS LAW-ABIDING.

But after the act had been passed I have never in a single speech or article said a word against it, because the Socialist Party almost slavishly and often foolishly obeys every law after it has been passed—even when the law is not to their liking.

In my own family all the male members that were of military age volunteered—two of them from my own household—not because they were particularly fond of the war, but because they were tall, strong boys who were sure to be drafted. Knowing the rubber-stamp qualities of our Congress, everybody expected the law would be passed when the administration demanded it.

Our Army did wonderfully well in Europe. Since the Central Powers were as much exhausted as the Allies, the entrance of our great country into the war at once decided it in favor of the Allies.

But how were these soldiers, whom our capitalist class now intends to corral into the folds of the American Legion for the upholding of exploitation and profiteering—how were these boys treated during the war?

OUR MILITARY CODE.

Carl Hagenbeck, the well-known circus man and animal trainer, said that the way to discipline wild animals was through the use of the iron rod, fear, and abuse. Lieut. Col. Woodruff, of the United States Army, quoted him and said the same thing applied to discipline in the Army.

Upon entering the ranks our boys were at once put under the military code of England of 1774, with the only difference that when passing sentence for infraction of some regulation, instead of "His Majesty the King" the President and Commander in Chief is substituted. The military code of every country, even of Great Britain, has been changed since 1774; but this being the greatest democracy in the world, and fighting to make the world safe for democracy, we have kept the old code.

We were in the war for almost a year and a half. During that time there were 25,000 major court-martials with prison penalties. There were 322,000 minor court-martials with loss of pay and guardhouse sentences.

There were also 19,000,000 infractions of military law, seven times as many as in the English and French armies combined.

Well, we had a war here, also, to uphold the Union and to abolish chattel slavery. That war lasted from 1861 to 1865. It was fought out in the main in the neighborhood of Washington, and fought by a force composed 95 per cent of volunteers. I have no figures at hand for court-martials during the Civil War. And although the old British code was enforced then also, I am sure that there were not nearly as many cases of courts-martial, even in proportion to the number of soldiers.

MORE SOCIALIST PREDICTIONS CAME TRUE.

Militarism and autocracy have been fastened upon us as the result of the war, just as the Socialists so often predicted.

What have we gained in this war—unless it is more persecution than ever known in the history of the country?

I am well aware, however, that this proposal to unseat me is not so much due to my position on this war as it is due to the fact that I am a Socialist.

It is the opinion of shrewd observers that a large number of Socialists in Congress would be a blessing to the conservatives of the country; the Socialists and their measures might possibly stand between present society and chaos.

Leading spokesmen of both of the old parties admit that a new party formation is an absolute necessity.

There is substantially no difference between the Republican and Democratic Parties, which are the two dominating political organizations to-day.

THE TWO OLD PARTIES.

Both of them are the servants and the tools of the capitalists. Both of them were willing and anxious to get this country into the war, as soon as a group of international financiers and their press had decided to have war.

Both of these parties seem to have no idea that in a democracy free citizens should have a right to decide about their own economic and political conditions.

Leaders of both parties have often openly admitted that there is no other difference between the two, except the question of who is to have the political offices. In other words, the battle is simply a question between the ins and the outs—the outs want to get in and the ins want to stay in. This is camouflaged usually by a sham battle on the tariff, on finance, or some other capitalist measure.

Neither of the two parties seems to have the faintest idea of the great social questions that are agitating the masses of the white nations to-day. Neither of the two old parties seems to have any plan of meeting the present emergencies and dangers other than mere repression by force and by militarism.

Both of them were willing and are willing to suppress free speech, free press, and the right of peaceful assemblage, in order to protect the ruthless plutocracy, and in the vain hope of keeping up an impossible system for all days to come.

Both parties meet economic and political facts with the same rhetoric and the same phrases that they learned from their fathers 100 years ago, although these phrases have ceased to have any meaning for the present day.

And this is not at all surprising, if we look at the method by which our Congress and other representative bodies are elected.

VOTING BY GEOGRAPHICAL GROUPS.

Under our present system we vote in geographical groups—that is to say, according to ward, city, county, State, and congressional districts. The result is that the choice of each voter, if he wants his ballot to count at all, is confined to the candidates of one or two political, partisan organizations—usually the Democratic and the Republican.

And the result is that the only candidates who can be voted on for an effective ballot are fellows who make a business and a livelihood of office seeking—mostly second or third rate lawyers, or handy men of rich corporations, and exploiters, with a slight sprinkling of men who are really zealous for the public good.

The further result is that the professional men who number less than 5 per cent of Americans engaged in occupations provide over 60 per cent of the so-called representatives in Congress.

323 LAWYERS IN CONGRESS.

Instead of the 20 Members of Congress to which they would be rightfully entitled if the Congress truly represented all citizens engaged in all occupations, the professional occupations have 388 Members in the present Congress, of whom 323 are lawyers.

Now, it is all nonsense to call such a body as truly representative of all the people.

I am not going into this any further, because it really has nothing to do with my case.

I am only mentioning it to show how little you gentlemen really represent the country.

But it is not only the unrepresentative character of Congress, but the type of the present membership, which is a real danger to this Nation.

Let me quote in this respect a witness whom undoubtedly most of you know.

THE OPINION OF AN OBSERVER.

Mr. Lynn Haines, of the National Voters' League—not a Socialist organization—says in the last number of The Searchlight:

There is nothing to be gained by self-delusion regarding the affairs of our Government. A real crisis is rapidly approaching. To sum up the opinion of informed persons with whom I have talked, or from whom I have heard, the two outstanding problems immediately facing American statesmanship are national bankruptcy and national hunger. The only doubt is not as to the imminence of these menacing issues; it concerns the ability of those in authority to find adequate remedies.

It is in no way reassuring to say that Congress is doing all that it can, that it knows how to do. The present National Legislature is the culmination of decades of training in politics rather than statesmanship. It represents primarily a great special interest, the business of politics. It is proficient in politics and nothing else.

No one will dispute that the Nation's finances are in an alarming state. We have spent as though our governmental resources were limitless. It makes no difference that these expenditures were for the most part necessary. We have borrowed and borrowed from Peter to pay Paul. And more borrowing seems probable in the near future. Already in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the country faces a certain deficit of nearly $4,000,000,000, with perhaps much more to be added through deficiency appropriations.

In two years all the problems of our Government have been multiplied at least by ten.

LOWEST LEVEL IN AMERICAN HISTORY.

Instead of being ten times wiser than before, the personnel of the present Congress represents probably the lowest level of statesmanship ever reached by any National Legislature in all the history of America.

And then Mr. Haines quotes Mr. Charles F. Nesbit, "a most reliable student of the business of government, and one whose conclusions are indisputable," as follows:

INTEREST CHARGE IN 1920 BIGGER THAN ENTIRE DEBT IN 1916.

At the end of the war we find that the Nation has outstanding an enormous indebtedness. This indebtedness, amounting to between $25,000,000,000 and $30,000,000,000, is about ten times greater in amount than any national indebtedness previously existing in our history.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. I will not yield now. I can make no exception, even to as good-looking a man as the gentleman from New York. [Laughter.]

We find now that the interest on the national debt will be fully $10 for each man, woman, and child in the United States; that is, the national interest charge on our debt will be more in 1920 than the entire debt was in 1916.

Now, you can not solve these questions, yet they must be solved. Do you really think that the presence of any Socialist student would hurt you?

THE FACTS IN THE CASE.

I do not believe that there is 1 Congressman in 50 who has taken the trouble to read through the two bulky volumes that constitute the hearing in my case; therefore I shall, in a few words, recite the main facts.

Now, the first fact is this:

At the last general election I was regularly elected to represent the fifth district of Wisconsin.

Even the majority report of the committee admits the following:

At the election held on November 5, 1918, he was again elected as a Socialist to the Sixty-sixth Congress, receiving 17,920 votes; Joseph P. Carney, the Democratic candidate, receiving 12,450 votes; and William H. Stafford, the Republican candidate, receiving 10,678 votes. No question is raised in this case as to the regularity of the election or the correctness of the election returns.

But I am to be barred from taking my seat on account of the position of the Socialist Party in this war, and because I was indicted upon orders from the Attorney General under charge of conspiracy to "interfere with the armed forces," and found guilty of the charge by a hand-picked Federal jury, each member of which, according to a statement in the Chicago Herald-Examiner, had the O. K. of the American Protective League—which was a branch of the Secret Service—before he was put on the jury. The same jury would undoubtedly have found many Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress guilty of the same charge if the jury had been selected for that purpose.

The overt acts which formed the alleged "conspiracy" consisted in the reprinting of the Socialist Party proclamation against wars, adopted at the Socialist convention at St. Louis, and in the printing of five editorials in the Milwaukee Leader expressing our disapproval of the Woodrow Wilson administration regarding participation in the European war.

There were four men indicted with me, two of whom I have known only very slightly. The prosecution did not charge that we had ever met to discuss the alleged "conspiracy," nor that we had ever planned or ever mentioned it to one another by means of correspondence or otherwise.

CONSPIRACY BY MEANS OF A "MEETING OF MINDS."

What the prosecution did charge was that five men holding similar opinions about the war, because they belonged to the same party, conspired by means of a "meeting of minds." This legal fiction outraged common sense, of course. Under this construction any man of any party anywhere in the United States could be indicted, convicted, and sentenced to 20 years in the penitentiary if his opinions upon public questions were offensive to the men temporarily in power. If you read these articles in question, or any of the articles written by me for many years before the indictment or after the indictment—you will find many of them in the report of the hearings—you will admit that the most rigorous construction of any of these articles by any person with a sane mind will not bear out the charge.

GERMAN-AMERICAN CIRCULARS AGAINST ME.

And the suggestion that any of them are pro-German must sound doubly ridiculous, because in the congressional elections of 1914 and 1916 certain German societies belonging to the National German-American Alliance sent out circulars against me, denouncing me as proally, because I was unyieldingly opposed to the Kaiser and to the war at that time, when it looked as if the Germans were sure to win out.

In short, my articles at that time, and before and after, were never pro-German and they were never proally. They were always international and prohumanity.

This decided position of mine, as late as November, 1916—that is, a few months before our country entered the war—resulted in very complimentary editorials and articles in the big proally eastern papers, like the New York Times, the Philadelphia North American, the Baltimore Sun, and others—compliments which I did not even appreciate at the time.

SOCIALIST OPPOSITION TO COMMERCIAL WARS AS OLD AS SOCIALISM.

Opposition of the Socialist Parties of all countries against imperialistic and commercial wars is as old as international Socialism. This was proven conclusively by the documents written and published in other countries which were produced at the hearings.

Opposition in this respect was first formulated in Geneva at the international congress of 1866. And if the opposition to imperialistic and commercial wars means a conspiracy, then the conspiracy against the World War of 1914 was really hatched out in 1866.

SOCIALISTS FIGHT ONLY FOR EMANCIPATION OR WHEN COUNTRY IS ACTUALLY INVADED.

Anybody who knows anything about the Socialist Parties of the world knows that the Socialists will fight only in wars of emancipation or revolution or when they are convinced that their country is actually invaded.

This was well known at the outbreak of the World War of 1914.

It is therefore worth noting that the proclamations of all the Socialist Parties in 1914 were worded very much like the proclamation and the war program of the American Socialist Party adopted in St. Louis in 1917. Even the phraseology was almost the same.

And it is also well known that the respective Governments of the various countries at war did succeed in getting the support of at least part of the Socialists only by convincing them that their respective countries had been actually invaded. This is the way the French, German, Austrian, and Belgian Socialists were persuaded to support their respective Governments. The Germans were told that the Russians had crossed the Niemen; the French were told that the Germans had crossed their border, and the same was told in Austria and everywhere.

SOCIALISTS SPLIT IN EVERY COUNTRY ON WAR.

In every country, however, there was a minority of the Socialist Party that stood out against the war, and did not falter. In Italy the antiwar element formed the majority of the party.

The great majority of the Socialists of the United States believed that the American people did not want war; that they were plunged into this war by the plutocrats and profiteers of the country—especially by a group of international financiers who had immense sums at stake—by their press, their demagogic agitators, their photoplays, their advertisements, and other instruments of public expression.

These American Socialists believed that this was in the main a capitalistic and commercial war between Great Britain and Germany for the commercial rule of the world—as expressed by the phrase "rule of the seven seas" of Great Britain, and the phrase "demanding a place in the sun" of Germany. Or, as President Wilson stated it, "They were bursting their commercial jackets."

The American Socialists believed, and still believe, that this was a criminal war in Europe and that it was doubly criminal for us to take part in it.

NOBODY BELIEVED THIS A WAR FOR DEMOCRACY IN 1914.

In 1914, when the war broke out, nobody spoke of it or thought of it as a war "to make the world safe for democracy." And now, since the war is over, no one thinks of it as a "war to make the world safe for democracy."

But right at the beginning of the World War the Socialists the world over understood what everybody now understands—that the English and the German capitalist classes were fighting for supremacy. And our ruling classes being in partnership with the English capitalist class, and connected by ties of blood and business, naturally threw their weight on the side of the Allies.

INTERNATIONAL CAPITALISM.

This partnership is best exemplified by the banking firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., of New York and London. Morgan & Co. acted as financial agents of the Entente until we got into the war.

But the Socialists were not the only ones opposed to the war. Many Republicans and Democrats in Congress, and out of Congress, believed the same.

And some of the Members of Congress have criticized the national administration and the war in stronger language than I did. They only had the advantage of being Members of Congress at the time.

And these were some of the most prominent Members of Congress: CHAMP CLARK, CLAUDE KITCHIN, FRANK MONDELL, W. E. MASON, and JAMES R. MANN. Extracts from their speeches, and from the speeches of many other Members, were quoted at my hearing.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the gentleman's remarks. I think it is an insult to this House to mention such men as CHAMP CLARK and CLAUDE KITCHIN in this manner.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is attempting to make it appear that the speeches of these gentlemen were after the declaration of war.

Mr. BERGER. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. These were the remarks of loyal American citizens.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is out of order; the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BERGER. Of course, the Members of Congress were cowed by our plutocratic and prostituted press, which lent itself very willingly to the war propaganda.

PROPAGANDA—BRITISH AND GERMAN.

I must also give British diplomacy credit for foresight in starting its propaganda early by buying up papers and getting ready for action in many other ways.

There can be no doubt, however, that Germany, after the war had begun, also started to neutralize British propaganda by German propaganda. But the German propaganda was ineffective and clumsy. Moreover, the German propaganda was up against the fact that so many of the big papers were owned by the profiteers, who were intensely interested in the allied cause because they had loaned money and furnished war materials.

Then there is also this fact, that the British propaganda had the undoubted assistance and good wishes not only of the capitalist class but of our national administration.

One of the most glaring particulars, for instance, was the bugaboo of the German invasion of the United States. There was the strongest army of the world within 50 miles of Great Britain and not a soldier could land on British soil. Yet some way or other our capitalist papers succeeded in making a good many of our people believe that a German Army could land here and "take all of our money away."

And that in the face of the fact that Germany had less than one-half of our man power, less than one-fourth of our wealth, a smaller navy than we had, and 3,000 miles of water to cross. Yet this idea was also expressed on a good many of the bill posters.

This propaganda was especially cruel and contemptible where it resulted in a campaign of hate against citizens of German blood or descent. There is no example in the history of the world where one-fourth of a nation—because folks of German blood make up about one-fourth of our Nation—have been persecuted and cowed to such an extent as was done during the last four years. And the end is not yet.

WOODROW WILSON AND THE WAR.

And remember the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, was one of those who wavered most during the first three and a half years of the World War.

There can be no doubt that the President seemed to be an especial admirer of the German Kaiser.

At a time when the Socialists and the Milwaukee Leader attacked the Kaiser and Germany most bitterly for being a party to the World War we find that on January 27, 1915, several months after the World War had begun, Woodrow Wilson sent the Kaiser the following cablegram:

In behalf of the Government and people of the United States I have the pleasure to extend to Your Majesty cordial felicitations on this anniversary of your birth, as well as my own good wishes for your welfare.

On May 13, 1915, and on July 23, 1915, Wilson used the following highly complimentary language in referring to the Imperial German Government, German views, and German influence after the World War had raged for a year:

Recalling the humane and enlightened attitude heretofore assumed by the Imperial Government in matters of international right. * * * Having learned to recognize German views and German influence in the field of international obligation as always engaged on the side of justice and humanity. * * *

The Government of the United States and the Imperial German Government are contending for the same great object, have long stood together in urging the very principles upon which the Government of the United States now so solemnly insists. They both are contending for freedom of the seas.

And that on February 3, 1916, nearly one and one-half years after the beginning of the war, President Wilson is on record as having said:

I have no indictment against any form of government.

On May 10, 1915, President Wilson is on record as having said:

The example of America must be a special example. The example of America must be the example of peace, not merely because it will not fight, but of peace because peace is the healing and the elevating influence of the world, and strife is not. There is such a thing as a man being too proud to fight.

President Wilson went on like this—

February 3, 1916:

We believe that we can show our friendship for the world and our devotion for the purposes of humanity better by keeping out of this trouble than by getting into it.

May 5, 1916:

There are two reasons why the chief wish of America is for peace. One is that they love peace and have nothing to do with the present quarrel * * *.

December 18, 1916:

I take the liberty of calling attention to the fact that the objects of the statesmen of the belligerents on both sides are virtually the same.

WOODROW WILSON NOW.

And then, from an interview with Senator McCUMBER at the White House on August 19, 1919, the following:

Senator McCUMBER. Do you think that if Germany had committed an act of war or act of injustice against our citizens that we should have gotten into this war?

President WILSON. I do think so.

Senator McCUMBER. You think we would have gotten in anyway?

President WILSON. I do.

This, too, despite the fact that President Wilson had declared on the eve of the 1916 presidential election (Sept. 30, 1916):

The certain prospect of the success of the Republican Party is that we shall be drawn, in one form or another, into the embroilments of the European war.

"HE KEPT US OUT OF WAR."

And it is a fact, denied by nobody, that Mr. Wilson was reelected President of the United States in November, 1916, with this slogan, "He kept us out of war." And then he rushed us into the war just a few months later.

Thus Mr. Wilson changed continuously in his tactics from "There is such a thing as a man being too proud to fight," May 10, 1915, to demanding a standing Army of 584,000 men and the biggest battle fleet we have ever had, in 1919, and this in spite of his assurance that "the covenant of nations has made war impossible forever."

The Socialists could not understand that kind of logic nor that kind of hypocrisy. They were opposed to imperialistic wars, and are still opposed to them.

THE INFAMOUS ESPIONAGE ACT.

But under the convenient legalistic term of "conspiracy"—construed by some of our Federal prosecutors and judges as a "meeting of minds," where the persons accused had never even met—and with an act like the infamous "espionage law," which forbade a man even to think against the war, any man, and even the men in Congress if they had not been protected by the Constitution, could have been indicted and found guilty of conspiracy individually and collectively.

They could be indicted, tried, and found guilty for the alleged utterances of persons whom they have known little or not at all, and for articles they have never seen—if the right kind of a panel could be gotten together by the United States prosecutor.

They could be indicted far away from their homes, compelled to give bail in another State, and convicted there by a Federal jury. The gentlemen whose names I mentioned above were protected from this tyrannical procedure only because they were Members of Congress.

But does the Constitution only protect the free speech of Members of Congress? And how long will it protect even Members of Congress if you permit this kind of procedure?

EXCESSIVE AND UNCONSTITUTIONAL BAIL.

A citizen of Milwaukee, Wis., I was indicted in the State of Illinois. I was compelled to furnish bail there amounting to $100,000. I am under bail for $45,000 more on other indictments in some places in Wisconsin, for the same articles, making a total of $145,000 of bail, which is surely unconstitutional.

Republicans and Democrats could be punished in exactly the same fashion for any opposition to a hostile national administration.

A few months ago President Wilson was quoted in the papers as having said that certain Senators should be "gibbeted" because they do not approve of his treaty. Supposing he insists that this idea should be incorporated in some kind of an espionage law? Well, these Senators happen to be prominent Republicans, so there is little likelihood that they will be hanged even on Mr. Wilson's say so.

But American Socialists were doomed beforehand, and called German Socialists and Bolsheviki in the capitalist press.

HAD ALL OUR PAPERS AND FILES.

The minions of the Department of Justice were in possession of all our papers and files. These spies had opened my letters and the letters of other defendants for many months before and after the indictment. And although there was not even the slightest shadow of evidence to connect any of us—or the Socialist Party—with German propaganda, the prosecution in our trial continually hinted at German propaganda.

A SUPERCZARISTIC POSTMASTER GENERAL.

The Milwaukee Leader and I have been prosecuted under the espionage act in an unheard of manner. Persecution of this type was not known even in Russia under the Czar or in Germany under the Kaiser.

The Milwaukee Leader not only lost its second-class mailing rights, by order of Postmaster General Albert Sydney Burleson, but he has also deprived us of the right to receive any and all kinds of mail, letters included. The Milwaukee Leader and its editors can not, even to-day, a year after the armistice was signed, receive any business letters, or even the New York Times or the Chicago Tribune, by mail.

The espionage act, which gave the Postmaster General unlimited discretion and formed the basis for many prosecutions by the Attorney General, proved to be a "peonage" law. It made political peons out of American citizens.

NO CITIZEN CONVICTED OF TRYING TO GET MILITARY SECRETS.

Under that infamous espionage act, according to the report of the Attorney General, not a single citizen was convicted of trying to find out military secrets. So far as there is any evidence, those accused of such offenses under the espionage act have been either acquitted or interned without imprisonment because they were not citizens.

American citizens, however, have been sentenced to terms as high as 20 years in the penitentiary for remarks made in private conversations about the war.

The Postmaster General and the Attorney General made it a crime to say or write that this war was caused by commercial rivalry.

To doubt that this was an idealistic war meant that the doubting Thomas was immediately arrested as a pro-German, or at least as a Socialist—for "chilling the ardor of our potential soldiers."

SENATOR HARDING CALLING A SPADE A SPADE.

Spokesmen of the Republican Party in the United States Senate, however, now frankly admit that the World War was a struggle for commercial supremacy. And all our financial and commercial papers now make no secret of that fact.

Senator HARDING, of Ohio, declared a few months ago that—

From the very beginning it was a lie to say that this was a war to make the world safe for democracy.

WAS A COMMERCIAL WAR, SAYS WOODROW WILSON.

And Woodrow Wilson, at the St. Louis Coliseum, September 5, 1919, enlightened the world, as follows:

The real reason that the war we have just finished took place was that Germany was afraid that her commercial rivals were going to get the better of her, and the reason why some nations went into the war against Germany was that they were afraid that Germany would get the commercial advantage of them.

And also, on the same date, in St. Louis, he said:

Peace? Why, my fellow citizens, is there any man here, or any woman—let me say, is there any child—who does not know that the seed of war in the modern world is industrial and commercial rivalry? * * * This war was a commercial and industrial war. It was not a political war.

Nevertheless, in 1917, Postmaster General Burleson suppressed about 60 Socialist publications and took the second-class mailing rights away from the Milwaukee Leader, and tries his utmost to kill the paper for saying the same thing in 1917 that Woodrow Wilson and everybody else is saying now.

"TWENTY YEARS" FOR SAYING IT TWO YEARS AGO.

And I was condemned to serve 20 years in the penitentiary for saying the same thing. Or was it a crime to tell the truth until Mr. Woodrow Wilson permitted it to be told?

LINCOLN AND WILSON.

Remember, Abraham Lincoln waged a war of four years infinitely more dangerous to our country and to the Union without any infamous law like the espionage act.

It was a war which divided the sentiment in almost every city, even in the North. It was a war which in the main was fought out and decided within 100 miles of Washington, while in the World War our boys had to travel over 3,000 miles to get a chance to break into the fight.

And yet Lincoln refused to have a gag law enacted.

It was different under the Woodrow Wilson administration, which made a specialty of slick and hypocritical democratic phrases and of autocratic and tyrannical acts.

With the exception of our English friends, who abuse Ireland and the Irish and also keep political prisoners in India, there is no other civilized country in the world to-day that has political prisoners.

NO DIFFERENCE MADE BETWEEN POLITICAL OFFENDER AND COMMON CRIMINAL.

And, what is still worse, this is the only civilized country in the world to-day where they do not differentiate between the political offender and the common criminals. A man who differs with Woodrow Wilson and his satellites, and is found guilty of this terrific crime, is treated as a common criminal and worse than a common criminal.

As a matter of fact, the Attorney General denies that there is such a thing as a political crime in America. If you differ with Wilson and Palmer in the interpretation of any political act, then you are a common criminal—not a political offender. For instance, Eugene V. Debs said this was a capitalist war, and for this he is serving a 10 years sentence as a "common criminal."

WHERE CZAR AND ATTORNEY GENERAL AGREE.

The Attorney General claims that we Socialists are to be punished for violating certain provisions of the law—the espionage act—not for our Socialist ideals.

And that is exactly what the Czar of Russia always told his subjects.

The thinking people of Russia were never punished for their political beliefs; they were always punished for violating the provisions of some Russian law.

And that is how the Czar raised the terrorists and the Bolsheviki and prepared a grave for himself and his wife and his children.

HYPOCRISY OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

To show the hypocrisy of the so-called department of justice: My comrades and I were told at the beginning of our trial in Chicago by the United States district attorney that "the Socialist Party is not on trial." A few minutes after we had been found guilty by the hand-picked jury, however, the same United States district attorney triumphantly declared, in an interview in the papers, that "Bolshevism had received a final blow from this verdict."

SOCIALISM IS NOT BOLSHEVISM.

Now, socialism is not bolshevism.

Socialism is the collective ownership and democratic management of the social means of production and distribution, while bolshevism, as far as I understand it, is communism combined with syndicalism.

Socialism stands for a new civilization.

Of course with people who believe that whatever is will exist forever and that we have reached the acme of civilization and the end of all things in economic progress, with such people it is entirely useless to argue. But surely no educated man believes that the present conditions are the end of all things. That we have not reached the end of our national development is clear. Every new invention and every new political question proves that to us.

Thinking men of all classes become Socialists not because we like to be "different" from other people. We are Socialists because we have recognized that the economical development of the present capitalist system leads toward socialistic production. There is also this: In former epochs the ruling classes were not only more able than the workers, but in many cases they differed in nationality, speech, and general make-up.

In modern countries the conditions are entirely different. The conquered class is of the same nationality, the same speech, the same mode of thought. And the ruling class is not better or stronger nor more able in any way.

Even in America, where common and hard manual labor is usually done by immigrants who belong to a different race and speak a different language than our capitalist class, and where the civilization and culture of the immigrant is often lower—even in America this difference holds good only for one generation, as a rule.

WORKER FIGHTS FOR CAPITALISTS.

Since the general introduction of public schools the proletariat, as a whole, gets at least the elements of the same kind of education. The ability to read and write opens to them the same avenue of knowledge and mental power that the ruling classes possess. The proletariat and the middle class not only do all the useful and necessary work which is to be done under the present civilization but they also have to keep up with that civilization. To-day civilization depends entirely upon the proletariat and middle class for its existence.

And what is more, the capitalist class is even unable to defend its position in case of danger. If there is any fighting to be done, the capitalist class has to hire and cajole the proletariat to do the fighting. The capitalist class holds its position only because the proletariat is asleep, and it is not conscious of its strength.

A statesman of old Rome said that the Romans could hold their slaves only because they had never counted themselves and their masters. However, since we have universal suffrage, there is good chance to count ourselves and our masters at every election.

Nor would the claim that God had ordained class rule hold good to-day. Not even the most stupid worker would believe Ogden Armour that God has ordained that he and the other big packers should form a trust to uphold the price of meat. Nor would anyone believe our magnates of the Steel Trust that they are descended from the gods and must rule.

PLUTOCRACY IS DOOMED.

Unless plutocracy can persuade the majority of the people to close up the public schools and make illiterates of the next generation, and unless it can also persuade them to give up the electoral franchise, plutocracy is doomed. So much is clear.

And that is the reason why we socialists can look with such equanimity and complacence into the future. The future belongs to some form of socialism.

And it will depend very much upon the action of the capitalist class and the behavior of capitalist governments during the next few years as to what is going to happen to the capitalist class not only in European countries but also in America.

It will depend on our rulers whether we shall have an orderly evolution, which I have always preached and propagated, or a violent revolution, which we Socialists have always tried to avoid.

Just now the plutocrats believe that they can quell the uprising of the working class by using force and by enacting special restrictive legislation. But remember, the Czar of Russia tried force to suppress ideas. Where is the Czar now? Where is his wife? Where are his children?

Prince Bismarck, one of the greatest statesmen Germany has ever produced, tried the enactment of special restrictive legislation against the Socialists. Bismarck lived long enough to regret it. Where is Germany now? If the Socialists can not save Germany, Germany can not be saved.

VERDICT IMPOSSIBLE UNDER KAISER OR CZAR.

But even at that I believe that a verdict like the one rendered in Landis's court in Chicago—and a sentence like his—would have been impossible under the Czar in Russia or under the Kaiser in Germany.

I believe that for the articles that I have printed and for which I was found guilty and sentenced to serve 20 years in the penitentiary, I should not have been punished 20 minutes in prison in Germany under the Kaiser or under the Czar in Russia.

Under acts passed by Congress as "war measures," however, many men have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment far exceeding the heaviest sentences for much worse offenses under the régime of the Czar or the Kaiser.

For the ruling class in America capitalism and Americanism have come to mean the same thing. The word "profit" and "patriotism" were used as synonyms by our profiteers during the war and ever since.

And all opposition to capitalistic, commercial, or imperialistic wars was regarded as "high treason." And all opposition to profiteering was denounced as disloyalty and "German propaganda."

CAPITALISTS FEAR SOCIALISM.

Bolshevism and socialism also mean the same thing to the capitalist class and its press. And the terms "Government" and the "national administration" were purposely confounded by the people who wanted war because it helped their business.

The capitalists fear socialism. They point to poor Russia, which is undergoing the pangs of rejuvenation, where a new society is to be born out of chaos and pain, as an example of socialism.

This is not the time nor the place to explain Bolshevism in Russia and to tell the difference between Bolshevism and socialism in detail, but there can be no doubt that the Bolshevist revolution is the natural result of czarism and of the methods the czars used against the socialists and liberals in Russia.

And if our authorities refuse the representatives elected by legal voters admission to legislative bodies, then the working people may be forced to discard their belief in representative government and in the ballot.

The Bolshevists do not favor representative government. They preach "direct action" and the "dictatorship of the proletariat."

The Bolshevists want to break entirely with the past. The socialists do not believe that a complete break is either possible or desirable. But, as I said before, the outcome will largely depend upon the attitude of the "powers that be" whether the socialists or the extremists will prevail.

LEAGUE CAPITALIST ALLIANCE.

Remember, less than two years ago the Kaiser was one of the most powerful men in the world. Less than three years ago the Czar was the autocrat of 170,000,000 people. Where are they to-day? And do you really believe that a revolution which did not stop before Kaiser and Czar will stop before the majesty of the money bag?

It is true our capitalist rulers may form a so-called league of nations. It is an alliance of the plutocratic governments against the socialist and the communist nations of Europe, the alliance to be directed and governed by the British plutocracy. Such a league will furnish no relief against armaments, high taxes, and wars. On the contrary, there will be more armaments than ever and more wars than ever.

And since ideas can not be excluded by bayonets, the communists may eventually win simply because of persecution. The present civilization may be lost entirely; the good in it will go down with the bad, which would be deplorable.

I repeat that I have nothing to retract from the articles that I have written or from the speeches I have made. All my predictions have come true. And a great deal more will come true than I have predicted.

This was the worst imperialistic war ever known in the history of the world. Every honest man who has any brains admits it now.

And because I am a student of the world's history, because I can see clearly, because I warned my fellowmen, my countrymen, of the events that were bound to happen if we pursued a certain course, therefore I was indicted, found guilty, and sentenced to serve 20 years in the penitentiary. This incident of being found guilty in Judge Landis's court for exercising my constitutional right of free speech and a free press should have nothing to do, however, with my being seated in the House of Representatives.

ONLY ONE MORE REASON TO SEAT ME.

And it would be ridiculous, of course, to pay much attention to the plea of the attorney for my Democratic opponent, Mr. Carney, that I must be excluded and Mr. Carney seated—although he received almost 6,000 votes less than I did—in order to make at least the Sixty-sixth Congress "safe," since I am sure to be reelected if Carney is not seated.

If my reelection is as certain as the attorney for Carney claims, then that is only one more reason to seat me, because I am the true choice of the electorate of the fifth district of Wisconsin.

Of course, it is the natural and usual thing that the people should reelect the man who expresses their ideas, especially if the man has proved to be true in face of persecution and prison. In European countries, including France and England, many men have been elected and reelected to parliaments who were under prison sentence. Most of the Sinn Fein men recently elected had been found guilty of "sedition" and "high treason" or were indicted and under arrest.

SEDITION ACT PROSECUTION IN 1798.

In our own country Matthew Lyon, a Member of Congress from Vermont, who had earned the hatred of President John Adams by ridiculing the aristocratic pretenses of our country's Chief Executive, was, under the sedition act of 1798, indicted, found guilty, and imprisoned for having written and printed certain articles and pamphlets. Congress had adjourned when the trial took place. Lyon served his full sentence of four months, but was reelected to Congress in 1799, while in prison.

The Federalist Party tried to expel Lyon from the House when he took his seat, but could not muster the necessary two-thirds majority, although the vote of the House did show a simple majority for expulsion.

Like all the other men who had been found guilty under the sedition act, Matthew Lyon was highly honored afterwards. He became a popular idol and was repeatedly reelected to Congress. His $1,000 fine was paid back to his heirs with accrued interest. Together with Thomas Jefferson, Matthew Lyon became one of the founders of the Republican-Democratic Party, now called the Democratic Party.

The Federalist Party, until then the ruling political organization, completely disappeared, mainly on account of having passed the sedition act.

It seems that the statesmen of the Democratic Party, including Woodrow Wilson, do not know the history of the origin of their own party. If they did they never would have passed the so-called espionage act, which is patterned after the old alien and sedition acts, only made very much more drastic and cruel. Even the truth of a statement is not permissible as a defense under Wilson's law. And the maximum punishment was raised from 3 years in 1798 to 20 years in 1917.

Yes, from time immemorial the bird of liberty was a jailbird, and it got to be more so since Woodrow Wilson "made the world safe for democracy."

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT AT STAKE.

Gentlemen, it may depend upon your decision in this case to a great extent whether the common people are to lose all faith in political elections and representative government—whether they are to turn to "direct action" and "soviets."

The tendency manifest among workmen of our country to-day is decidedly against "politics" and in favor of "direct action." The only "politics" the workingmen know in this country—with the exception of very few places in the Middle West and the Northwest—is capitalistic politics. And this "politics" is so discredited that even the Boston policemen will not trust the promises of politicians, but prefer "direct action" and the strike.

There is a growing distrust of representative government everywhere, even in the classic land of parliamentarism, in England.

Although the advocates of the British labor party point to the fact that Lloyd-George has lost to the laborites practically every election held since last December, there are in many quarters symptoms of indifference and even contempt for parliamentary methods. This fact almost resulted in the triple alliance of miners, transport workers, and engineers declaring a "general strike" against British intervention in Russia and against conscription. If such a general strike ever should take place, England will see the beginning of a social revolution.

There is the same indifference to parliamentarism in France and Italy, and it is commencing to show itself in Germany and the Scandinavian countries.

URGES ORDERLY METHODS OF CHANGE.

If it were not for the Socialist Parties everywhere, representative government would soon come to an end in Europe.

In one instance after the other, labor unions are showing their willingness to accept the strike, and especially the general strike, as their sole weapon, and they are willing to use this weapon to enforce all of their demands, political and economic.

It is due to this tendency that at the special convention of the Socialist Party of America, held during the first week of September, this year, a part of our organization split off. They started the Communist Labor Party and the Communist Party, neither of which has any faith in representative government and parliamentarism.

Now, I do not believe in the present capitalist system. I am convinced that it has outlived its usefulness and must make room for a new order of society. I believe in sane and orderly methods, however, to bring about that necessary change, provided we are permitted to use sane and orderly methods.

And if you gentlemen would only have your ears to the ground and not trust to the capitalist newspapers entirely for your information—if you gentlemen would read the signs of the times, even between the lines of these capitalist papers—you would soon come to the conclusion that besides furnishing a bad precedent it would be foolish and criminal to deprive the Socialist Party—a party casting over a million votes—of its sole representative in Congress.

SOCIALISTS BLESSING TO COUNTRY.

Special legislation to keep "undesirable" Members out of Congress surely will work both ways. Some day it may be used by Socialists or other radicals against the representatives of the capitalist class, especially if the present decisions will furnish a sufficient precedent.

Every thinking man should keep in mind that over half of the white race is in a chaotic stage of revolution at the present time, out of which revolution must develop an orderly socialist reign within the next five years. Every thinking American should take into consideration that England, France, and Italy will soon join the world-wide social revolution.

Can America alone escape a world-wide movement of the white race?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order. The privileges of this House in debate do not warrant any person in making statements that would tend to preach anarchy and revolution in this country. I submit that the statements of this person now speaking on the floor of the House have not only denounced the Government, the flag, and the institutions and its hopes and purposes, but the memory of our dead soldiers in France. I claim that it is out of order, Mr. Speaker, in the proceedings in the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The Chair would state that if the gentleman to whom time has been yielded has offended along the lines suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] it is certainly not in order, and the gentleman will proceed in order.

MAY RUE THE DAY.

Mr. BERGER. It will avail our statesmen nothing to hide their heads in the sand of reaction and to forbid immigration, or even to deport rebels. You can not build a Chinese wall against ideas.

There are 10,000,000 men and women in this country always on the brink of pauperism and starvation. You can not expel all of them. You can not kill all of them. You need them under the capitalist system as a reserve army of labor for your industries.

You can not solve this question. And yet this question must be solved. Our reactionaries may soon rue the day when they persecuted the representatives of evolutionary Socialism and thus invited a cataclysm which is bound to bury the present system and its defenders.

Under these circumstances and conditions, it is almost a waste of time to answer the allegations and so-called findings of the special committee, headed by Mr. DALLINGER, of Massachusetts. Its very premises are false, and the report is prejudiced.

The majority of the committee charges me with "disloyalty" during this war because I have adhered to the old-established international position of the Socialist Party of America.

WHAT IS LOYALTY?

Now, I ask you, gentlemen, what does the majority of the committee understand by "loyalty"?

If loyalty means to support under all circumstances the interests and actions of Morgan and Rockefeller and the international group of profiteers and privateers who happen to have control of the national administration, and to forego all opposition and to forget all your principles, then the Socialist Party was disloyal and I was disloyal.

But if loyalty means to be true to the interests of the greatest mass of the people and to stand fearlessly and honestly for what you believe is for the good of the greatest mass, then the Socialists were eminently loyal to the American people and the American Government.

There is not the slightest hint and none could be even suggested of any connection with or inclination toward any foreign power with which we were at war by the American Socialist Party or any member thereof. All efforts failed to connect us in any way.

The committee began by declaring that it would not consider the case pending in the Federal courts in Chicago, but go at it independently. Yet they considered practically nothing else. They evidently started out with the intention of finding my articles in the Leader disloyal, pro-German, and treasonable.

The majority report of the committee also states that—

As a matter of fact, as we have already pointed out, that at the outbreak of the European war the Socialist parties of other countries, including the majority Socialist Party of Germany, supported their Governments; and the Socialist Party in the United States might have done the same if it had not been for the efforts of Mr. Berger and his associates.

THE SOCIALIST PARTIES IN ALL BELLIGERENT COUNTRIES SPLIT ON THE WAR.

As a matter of fact, all the Socialist parties in the belligerent countries of Europe split in two at the outbreak of the war. While the majority in France, England, Austria, and Germany supported their Governments on the pretext that their respective countries had been invaded, there was a strong minority in every one of these countries opposed to the war.

In Italy, Serbia, and Roumania practically the entire party stayed true to its principles and against the war.

In Italy the Socialists even tried a general strike to prevent the Government from entering the war, which strike was successful in 1914 and prevented Italy from entering the war on the side of the Central Powers, but was unsuccessful in 1915 in keeping Italy from joining the Allies.

PRAISED THE ANTIWAR SOCIALISTS IN GERMANY.

And the queer part of it is that while the American plutocratic press and all the profiteers and their tools were praising highly the minority Socialist Party in Germany for opposing the war, while the World War was on, these same agencies were condemning, and are condemning, the Socialist Party of America for doing the same thing.

SOCIALISTS WILL ALWAYS RESIST ACTUAL INVASION.

As for quoting my telegram at the time of the trouble on the Mexican border, when Villa's band crossed the border and killed American citizens in Columbus, N. Mex.; and also my stand in the case of an invasion of our territory by the Japanese—"that the Socialists would stand by the country to the last ditch"—this position, of course, is absolutely in accordance with the long-established position of the Socialists—that we will resist all actual invasion of our country at all hazards. As a matter of course, we would resist invasion by any armed forces of Germany, England, Timbuctoo, or any other, in the same fashion.

A RIDICULOUS CHARGE.

As to the charge of "pro-Germanism," I will say again that as a matter of fact I have been twice defeated for Congress, in 1914 and 1916, for my opposition to the war at a time when the Germans were winning, because certain German-American societies started the charge that my position was proally.

AN EDITORIAL IN THE NEW YORK TIMES.

And I quote the following editorial in the New York Times of August 27, 1916, a few months before the entrance of our country into the war.

The editorial is headed "A man—and in Wisconsin."

One of the agents of the German propaganda, it seems, has published a syndicated letter in German-language newspapers urging Socialists in Wisconsin to cut their tickets—to vote for Republican candidates for Congress who have truckled to the German vote, and in particular for two who voted for the Gore resolution. These two, Stafford and Cary, have Socialist opponents. One of them, Victor L. Berger, carried his district a few years ago and served them in Congress. The Socialists are strong in Wisconsin, and presumably Berger and his fellow candidate, Winfield R. Gaylord, have a chance of election. But the Socialists are urged to put the Kaiser's interests above those of their party and their social creed and vote for Stafford and Cary.

Victor L. Berger himself was born in Germany. He lives in Milwaukee, a city full of men born in Germany.

But he is an American. He hitches no hyphens on his allegiance. Here is the answer his newspaper, the Milwaukee Leader, makes to the hyphenated proposal to his constituents:

"The American Socialists are not serving as the political chattels of any foreign power. They do not take their orders from the Kaiser, or the Czar, or King George. * * * It is natural enough that German-born Socialists should sympathize with their fatherland, as it is natural that the English, the Scotch, the Irish, and the French should give their sympathies to their kin beyond the sea. But here they have made their homes. Here their children have been born. Here their future lies. Their material and sentimental bonds are stronger here than to any other land. German-American Socialists are not going to betray the trust that the working class placed in them by putting alien interests above their own interests and the interests of their class. They are going to act as Americans and as class-conscious Socialists, not as the political trading stock of scheming politicians.

"If it were not so utterly fatuous, a fouler blow could not be dealt to the German-Americans, Socialists and non-Socialists alike, than has been dealt to them by the professional 'German-American' busybodies who have been boasting of their purpose to vote the German-Americans en masse for men who are destitute of every personal attribute—such as loyalty and sacrifice, a sense of duty, and devotion to ideals—that has ennobled the German character."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I have only two more pages.

Mr. VAILE and Mr. STRONG of Kansas rose.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman wish to have?

Mr. BERGER. Fifteen minutes more will do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] have control of the time.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield Mr. Berger 15 minutes additional time out of my time.

Mr. BERGER. I thank the gentleman. I quote further from the New York Times:

There is the answer of a man. In this time of truckling of politicians who are afraid to say their souls are their own, it is worth while to see here and there the exception. Whether he wins or loses the election, this German-born socialist in a German-born constituency has given a living illustration of what an American should be and what too many Americans born on this soil are not.

I certainly have no influence in New York and could not influence the editor of the New York Times.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUALIFICATIONS.

It is also useless for me to point out that I believe that the qualifications of a Member of the House are clearly stated in the Constitution, and that while each House is the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members, the House has no right to add to these qualifications, which are plainly enumerated in the Constitution.

As to section 3 of the fourteenth amendment, that plainly applied to the Civil War and contained a provision by which Congress, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, could abolish the effect of the amendment. In other words, the amendment itself provided the way of its own negation.

QUESTION IN NUTSHELL—FREE SPEECH AND FREE PRESS.

In short, to express the whole affair in a nutshell, this case is simply a question of free speech and a free press. It is simply a question whether I had a right to publish the St. Louis war program of the Socialist Party and the articles in the Milwaukee Leader which I did publish.

The majority report praises highly the few renegades of the Socialist Party, who numbered less than one to a thousand of the total membership, because they betrayed their party and their principles, went over to the "war paytriots," and were rewarded with missions and positions—a handful of men like John Spargo, A. M. Simons, Charles E. Russell, and a few more.

THERE WERE RENEGADES IN EVERY CRISIS.

Well, there have been at all times and in all crises—religious, political, and economic crises—men who deserted their fellows and went over to the oppressors, but that is no reason why I should be refused my seat in the House because I stood true to my principles.

There is no civilized country in the world where this could happen, except in the blessed land of the profit amounting to billions of dollars.

This majority report if adopted will put a lasting blot upon the pages of the parliamentary history of our country.

A VICIOUS PRECEDENT.

And what is worse, my exclusion will make an extremely vicious precedent. The crooked, perverse, and dishonest conclusions of the majority report will in the very near future plague its inventors.

So much for Mr. DALLINGER and others.

I can take back nothing from what I said in my speeches and in my articles. Under the same circumstances I would say and write it all over again, only I would make it a great deal stronger, because I have been justified by the events since the armistice was concluded and the war practically ended.

CONVICTION TRAVESTY ON JUSTICE.

To sum up, I have always been proud of the Socialist record of observance of law. I have always tried to change or repeal such laws as, in my opinion, were harmful. My work was always constructive. I have always striven to conserve what is best in capitalist civilization as an inheritance for coming generations.

The law under which suppression of free speech and of free press was enforced is a flat denial of rights guaranteed every citizen by the Constitution of the United States. The manner in which that unjust and inherently unconstitutional law was used to procure my conviction for a crime which I never in word, deed, or spirit contemplated was a travesty upon justice.

My case is still pending in the courts on an appeal. I am confident that the verdict will be reversed by the higher tribunal. I believe that the higher court will hold that I was within my constitutional rights in printing these editorials. A man can not be considered guilty, especially in a political case of this kind, until the highest court in the land has spoken. And in the opinion of real democrats, he will not be considered guilty at any time.

The fifth district of the State of Wisconsin is entitled to be represented by the man of its own choice. I say again, it is not the personal case of Victor Berger—representative government is on trial.

And the particular question now is, Does the National House of Representatives desire to unseat the regularly elected and regularly certified Representative of the fifth district of Wisconsin because he stood honestly and loyally by his principles?

I AM SPEAKING FOR YOU.

Gentlemen, in making this statement to you at this time I am not speaking for myself, nor for the Socialists, or even for the working class—I am speaking for you.

If I should have to leave my post now, it is because of a persecution which in its last analysis is caused by fear—fear of the working people, in whom the "powers that be" see nothing but Bolshevism. This fear has America in its grip just now. And fear is always evil.

Gentlemen, I know that your hearts are not in this exclusion; I know that there are not a half dozen of the men with whom I have served in the Sixty-second Congress who are willing to exclude me.

And had you but the courage to oppose the "powers that be"—the powers that own the press and that own America—I should remain as long as my people would send me to labor with you for the welfare of this Nation. I may tell you at least that some of the older Members have voluntarily assured me that could a secret ballot be taken that I would be seated.

If I am excluded, it will be through fear—through fear on the part of Representatives elected by the people, who, sheltered as they are by the Constitution, could well afford to set an example of fearlessness. However, as the nestor of this House very truly stated on some occasion, "There is nothing more cowardly than a Congressman, unless it be two Congressmen." And you are "playing politics," gentlemen, and permit me to tell you that you are playing bad politics.

A VICIOUS LAW—CUT IT OUT.

The so-called espionage act, while dignified by the name of a law, is, as a matter of fact, but a violation of law. There was probably never a piece of legislation that has wrought so much damage as this espionage act.

No law has ever cut so deeply into the American conscience. There was never a law that has created so much misery, brought so much irreparable wrong, has created so much hatred and suspicion. It has made brother accuse brother. It has sold honor and has bought immunity. Congress could do nothing more important at any time than to repeal this infamous act at once.

FEAR NOT!

It is of little use now to discuss what Congress could have done or failed to do during this period of trial and distress. Congress has been numbed by fear, and for that reason had failed to function. Fear is man's chief foe.

The Master's most frequent greeting to His followers was "Fear not!" Until we conquer fear, usefulness can not begin.

YOU CAN NOT DICTATE TO THE FIFTH DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN.

Remember, gentlemen, you may exclude me once. You may exclude me twice. But the fifth district of Wisconsin can not permit you to dictate what kind of a man is to represent it. If representative government shall survive, you will see me or a man of my kind—let us hope many men of my kind—in the Nation's Legislature.

Therefore, whatever decision you may make, I will just say "Au revoir."

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BERGER. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. VAILE. The gentleman stated, if I got his remark correctly, in the early part of his address, that the Socialists had always foolishly and slavishly obeyed the law. Do I understand that it is the gentleman's view that it may be foolish or slavish to obey the law?

Mr. BERGER. There are certain laws that are best not obeyed. We have obeyed every law, but there are certain laws in every country and in every time that can not be obeyed. That is how this Nation got to be free 143 years ago.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BERGER. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. Does the gentleman reserve to himself the right to say what laws shall or shall not be obeyed?

Mr. BERGER. I do not, and that is why I have always obeyed all laws.

Mr. VAILE. Does the gentleman concede that to any citizen—the right to reserve to himself to say what laws shall or shall not be obeyed?

Mr. BERGER. I would concede that to any majority of citizens or any large body of citizens, because you can not indict a country or indict a nation.

Mr. VAILE. Does the gentleman concede to a majority of the citizens the right to obey or not to obey the law?

Mr. BERGER. Yes; I concede that to the majority of the citizens.

Mr. VAILE. Before that law is changed?

Mr. BERGER. Oh, they can change the law.

Mr. VAILE. While it is in effect, would the gentleman concede to a majority of citizens the right to obey or disobey the law?

Mr. BERGER. That would depend upon conditions. As a rule the only way to change a law is to do it in the legal, orderly, and democratic fashion, but there may be cases—of course there have been cases of that kind in the history of every country and in every nation—when a majority of the citizens did not obey certain laws, could not or would not obey them.

Mr. VAILE. Just one question more——

Several Members rose.

Mr. BERGER. Oh, one after another, please.

Mr. VAILE. What did the gentleman mean when he said it was foolish to obey the laws of the United States?

Mr. BERGER. I did not say it was foolish. I prided myself on the fact that Socialists have always obeyed the laws, even when certain laws were foolish.

Mr. VAILE. Did the gentleman pride himself on the fact that the Socialist Party has slavishly and foolishly done anything?

Mr. BERGER. Well, even the Socialist Party has always foolishly, and even slavishly, obeyed every law, and I was largely responsible that it has done so.

Several Members rose.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. BERGER. I will yield to gentlemen after the other. Who was next?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Unless this other gentleman [Mr. EMERSON] wanted me to answer his question before you did.

Mr. EMERSON. This is a government of the majority.

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir. It is supposed to be a government by majority.

Mr. EMERSON. If a majority of the people of this country wanted Socialism they could get it under our Constitution and laws, could they not?

Mr. BERGER. I hope that they could.

Mr. EMERSON. They could.

Mr. BERGER. I am not sure about that.

Mr. EMERSON. If a majority of the people of this country wanted Socialism or Bolshevism or sovietism or anything like that, they could get it under our laws?

Mr. BERGER. We would have to change the Constitution.

Mr. EMERSON. They could get it, if they wanted it.

Mr. BERGER. Yes; if they changed the Constitution.

Mr. EMERSON. Then, why would there ever be any need for direct action?

Mr. BERGER. I have never preached "direct action" in my life. I have always opposed it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Did not the gentleman write over his signature that a revolution, blood and iron, was necessary in the United States, and that workingmen should carry muskets?

Mr. BERGER. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What did the gentleman say of that?

Mr. BERGER. I know my articles better than the gentleman does. That article was written in 1909. I said that in case the decision of the majority—in case that the majority of the votes are not obeyed, then the people may have to resort to force of arms. That is what is said.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What about carrying a musket?

Mr. BERGER. A man has a right to carry a musket under the second article of the Bill of Rights. I have carried a rifle when I went hunting.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But not for the purpose of revolution?

Mr. BERGER. Oh, I have never carried a rifle for the purpose of revolution; it was to get a deer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then, the gentleman thinks the socialists have foolishly obeyed the law?

Mr. BERGER. Yes; I think most of them have obeyed laws even when the laws were foolish.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman advocate that the socialists after breaking the law should claim the protection of the laws that he thinks they are foolish in obeying?

Mr. BERGER. I did not say anything of the kind. I said the socialists have always foolishly and slavishly obeyed every law. I simply made a statement—which I will repeat—that the socialists prided themselves on obeying every law, even where the law is foolish.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. I should yield next to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. One more question. The gentleman spoke of Russell and Spargo as ex-socialists?

Mr. BERGER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Meaning to infer that they had become Americans, did he?

Mr. BERGER. No. I believe the real American of the future is the socialist.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And these gentlemen who refused to stand against the Government in time of war are now spoken of with derision as ex-socialists?

Mr. BERGER. We did not stand against the Government; we stood by the Government as we understand the term "Government." We were in opposition to Woodrow Wilson's administration. Administration and Government are not the same thing.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman has stated, I believe, that he had nothing to retract from the position he took upon which this action by the Department of Justice was based?

Mr. BERGER. Department of injustice.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The article containing the several provisions was drawn up by this Socialist committee on the 7th of April, was it not, and among those provisions this is stated:

> That we recommend to the workers and pledge ourselves to the following course of action: Continued active and public opposition to the war through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power.

Now, then, the gentleman has stated that some socialists in Italy advocated and threatened a general strike.

Mr. BERGER. They did. They went on strike in 1914 against Italy joining the Central Powers, and were successful. And again in 1915 against Italy joining the Allies, in which they were not successful.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. They went on strike. That would be one evidence of the meaning of the use of "other means within our power" that was then contemplated by your committee?

Mr. BERGER. Nothing of the kind was contemplated. The Socialist Party favors political action and is on record against "direct action."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. If it is desired to exclude from the RECORD the speech just delivered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Berger, when is the proper time to make such a motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think now.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, if some gentleman who is a member of the committee does not at this time make the motion, I will. In view of the character of the speech made, which, in my judgment, makes an unwarranted attack upon the executive, the judicial, and the legislative branches of the Government, I move that the speech be excluded from the RECORD, and on that I move the previous question. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that——

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order at this time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry? I did not catch the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will repeat his motion.

Mr. MONDELL. Was the gentleman from Missouri recognized to make a motion?

Mr. RUCKER. I was recognized.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rose for a parliamentary inquiry, and then proceeded and made the motion. Yes; the Chair thinks that he was recognized. The gentleman will repeat his motion.

Mr. RUCKER. My motion is that the speech just delivered on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Berger, be not permitted to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not care to discuss the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman's reason why it is not in order.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HICKS. Did not the Chair state to the gentleman from Missouri, when the gentleman from Missouri was about to make the motion, that it was in order for the gentleman from Missouri to make the motion, and has not the Chair already rendered a decision about the opportunity and time to make such motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked the Chair when it would be in order, and the Chair said—well, the Chair meant if in order at all it would be in order then. But the Chair does not consider himself bound by that.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, if there is any question about the motion I made being in order, I do not want to be capitous about it, but I do think it would be an outrage to print and circulate such a speech as this in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt whether it is in order or not——

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair is willing to hear argument as to whether it is in order or not.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am perfectly willing that the House should vote on the question, and therefore I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. RUCKER. Let us vote, then, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] moves that the speech of the gentleman be not printed in the RECORD. Did the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] make a motion?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Missouri on the table.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make the point that the House voted that the time on one side should be controlled by myself and on the other side by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. DALLINGER. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] withdrew his point of order, and the Chair understands that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] renews it.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this is not the time for any such motion. I do not understand how the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] can be recognized. The House had voted that the debate on this resolution should be limited to five hours and a half, one hour and a half to be given to Mr. Berger to make his plea in his own behalf and the other four hours to be equally divided between the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] and myself; and just as soon as Mr. Berger had concluded it seems to me the Chair should have recognized either me or Mr. EAGLE and have asked us about the time.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts pretend that simply because that arrangement was made the privileges of this House have all gone into the discard, and that if anybody abuses them the House is powerless to take action at this particular time?

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me unless there was a point of order made, that any recognition for the purpose of making a motion after the House had voted what should be done in regard to this debate, without a reconsideration of that vote, would be out of order.

Mr. WINGO. May I submit this thought to the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. The rules and practices of the House are very clear and uniform. If a Member addressing the House uses language that is either personally objectionable or unparliamentary, or which violates the privileges of the House, there are two ways by which said language can be stricken from the RECORD. First, as soon as the objectionable language is uttered, any Member can rise in his place and demand that the words be taken down. Then, when that is done, the words are read to the House, and a motion is in order to strike them from the RECORD. The next procedure is this—and it is one predicated upon the privilege of the whole House—that subsequently, even after the day has passed, any Member may rise to a question of privilege of the whole House, but in order to do that he must offer a privileged resolution. The decisions are that no action under the guise of privilege of the whole House can be taken except upon a privileged resolution setting out the objectionable matter which violates the privileges of the House, and carrying with it a resolution to strike the objectionable matter from the RECORD. Now, in this case the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman from Texas, I believe it is, had control of the time. No one else was entitled to the floor except those two gentlemen, unless they deliberately permitted some one else to come in. Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] does not lose his rights even if the Speaker, maintaining the regular procedure, should rule his motion out of order at this time. If he believes the language violates the privileges of the House, then when we have voted upon the pending question he can present to the House a privileged resolution, rising to the question of privilege of the whole House, reciting the fact or the language wherein it violates the privileges of the House, and resolve that it be not printed in the RECORD. That is the orderly procedure, and I think it is to the best interests of the House to pursue that course.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman from Arkansas contend that the Speaker could not recognize any Member to move, not by written resolution but by oral motion, to exclude from the RECORD any speech made on the floor?

Mr. WINGO. I do. I think if the gentleman will look it up he will find action must be predicated upon a formal resolution, unless the demand is made to take down the objectionable words at the time they are spoken. I had occasion to look that up not long ago, and for that reason I presented a privileged resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege of the House. I present a resolution, which is a privileged resolution, and which I ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman can not present it during the discussion of this point of order. If it is in order, it is only in order because it is a question of high privilege.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman permit me to make one statement? Then I am through.

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. WINGO. My only purpose in addressing myself to the point of order was to suggest that we pursue the usual course, and thereby maintain orderly procedure. I am in sympathy with the end sought, but think it best to follow the regular custom and rule governing such matters.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I did not believe when I rose and made the motion that I was going to be reprimanded and censured by all the experts in the House, but it seems to me I am going to be——

Mr. WINGO. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I had no such intention.

Mr. RUCKER. I take what the gentleman has said kindly. I make no objection. But I want to suggest to the House and the Speaker this fact, that at the conclusion of the speech as delivered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Berger, I rose and submitted to the Speaker the parliamentary inquiry that if it be desired to prevent the publication of this speech in the RECORD, when is the proper time to make the motion? And the Speaker said, "Now." I then announced to the House that if no gentlemen on the committee desires to make such motion I will ask the Chair to recognize me for that purpose. No objection was made until after I made the motion. I think the Speaker was right in his ruling that I had the right to recognition under the circumstances. I submit the motion ought to be put to the House.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I will submit this observation. If the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Berger, had been a Member of the House——

Mr. EVANS of Montana. From Wisconsin——

Mr. POU. I beg pardon of the other State—if he had been a Member of the House and had used unparliamentary language, then the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] would undoubtedly have been in order. That is, if he had asked to have his words taken down. Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin is not a Member of the House, and surely that can not alter the situation. He certainly can have no greater privilege in addressing the House than a Member. Therefore, in my judgment, the House undoubtedly has the right to strike from the RECORD objectionable matter immediately after it is uttered, whether the speaker is a Member or one addressing the House purely by courtesy.

Now, with respect to the time, that position can not be tenable, because if the gentleman from Wisconsin had been a Member of the House undoubtedly the motion would have been in order, even though the time had been divided as it has been under the order of the House in this instance. And so by analogy I respectfully submit that it was strictly within the power of the Speaker to recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] and to put his motion under the rules of the House. Division of time between two Members does not mean that everything done must be by one or the other or by their permission, for no one can tell what may occur which might entitle some other Member to recognition in spite of the agreement as to the division of time. Exactly that situation has now arisen, and I submit the Speaker was acting in accordance with the rules, practice, and procedure of the House when he chose to recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. BEE rose and addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Chair is called upon to rule upon the point of order, because a motion to lay upon the table was made before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] raised the point of order. But I think the Chair might well take into consideration this fact, that this gentleman from Wisconsin occupied the floor of the House as a matter of courtesy, and not of right, and that the House at this stage or in the middle of his speech, if it saw fit and felt that its privileges had been violated, could have terminated the speech and refused him further to be heard.

Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], on the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, rose and called attention to some of the utterances which the gentleman had made and moved that those remarks be not printed in the RECORD. It is all a matter of the privileges of the House, and certainly one who is not a Member of the House can have no greater right than we who are Members and who have taken an oath to support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States, and if we wish at this particular time to stop these proceedings and apply any remedy that we might see fit to apply, I do not quite understand how a point of order can be raised when the whole matter is based and founded upon the privileges and the dignity of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. WOOD of Indiana rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the Chair might very properly have refused to recognize any one other than the gentlemen who, under the rule, control the time. The Chair did recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. The gentleman from Missouri made a motion. I have made a motion to lay that motion on the table. I think there is no doubt but what, when recognized, the gentleman from Missouri had the right to move to strike from the RECORD the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin. [Applause.] It is a question for the House to determine whether they shall be stricken from the RECORD. Personally I have no desire to make a martyr of the gentleman from Wisconsin by moving or voting to strike his remarks from the RECORD.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Wyoming feel that this RECORD of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-sixth Congress should contain the statements of a gentleman not a Member, criticizing and impugning the motives of every Member of this House of Representatives? [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. And traducing the country?

Mr. WALSH. If those statements were made by myself or by the gentleman from Wyoming they would be stricken out under proper procedure in the twinkling of an eye. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts had his remedy. He could have asked to have the words taken down at any time. He can vote to exclude them from the RECORD.

Gentlemen had their remedy. The House still has its remedy. If a majority of the Members think any good cause is served by excluding the statements made by the gentleman from Wisconsin from the RECORD, well and good. My own opinion is that the House, having given the gentleman from Wisconsin an opportunity to speak, he having spoken without interruption on the ground that his words were not parliamentary, we would be making a great mistake and would make a martyr of the gentleman from Wisconsin in the eyes of some at least by refusing to allow his words to appear in the RECORD. Gentlemen who imagine they would prevent their circulation by so doing would find themselves mistaken. They would only increase their circulation by that action. I believe the gentleman's words uttered when he was speaking by courtesy of the House condemn him. I am willing that all may read them.

Mr. COOPER rose.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. RUCKER. So far as I am concerned, I am not seeking to make a martyr of the gentleman, but I want to make men of this Congress. [Applause.] And I for one am not in favor of using the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the purpose of spreading broadcast to-morrow morning this tirade, abusing every department of our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. My idea is that neither the standing of the gentleman from Missouri nor of any other Member of this House is affected by anything that the gentleman from Wisconsin has said or could say. The most conclusive argument in support of the action the House will take in his case will be found in the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin. Let them be printed by all means. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I think the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin are seditious. They are un-American. They are an attack upon the Government of the United States, and I do not think we ought to quibble for one minute as to what we should do, but we should strike those words from the RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my motion is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman debated it. [Laughter and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana wish to argue that it is in order or that it is not in order?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to argue that it is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to hear any argument on that. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the only question before the House is as to whether or not the Speaker should have recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] to make the motion.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the question before the House is the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. The point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] differs from that made by the gentleman from Minnesota in that the gentleman from Massachusetts claimed that the Chair had no right to recognize the gentleman from Missouri at this time to make the motion. He did not argue that the motion was not in order.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Wyoming contend that the only person that the Speaker could recognize was the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE], and that the Speaker could not even have recognized a Member to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MONDELL. I stated my position a moment ago, that I thought the Speaker would have been entirely justified in recognizing no one except the gentlemen who were named in the rule as entitled to the floor.

Mr. HASTINGS. But he has recognized some one else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair understands the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to suggest that the only point of order pending is that made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], that the Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] when he had no right to recognize him. Is that the only point of order?

Mr. DALLINGER. I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] was recognized because he rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. He was, at first.

Mr. DALLINGER. And my point is that he should not have been recognized, because immediately upon the conclusion of Mr. Berger's speech the disposal of the time was with Mr. EAGLE and myself, and that unless a Member wanted to make a point of order or something of that kind, he should not have been recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not shield himself by the technicality, but will rule on the whole question. It has been suggested to the Chair that he might be relieved of the point of order because of the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to lay on the table; but the Chair thinks the gentleman from Minnesota was on his feet at the same time, and that he had a prior right to make the point of order, so that the point of order justly comes before the House.

As to the question whether the Chair had the right to recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] or not, the Chair did not know for what purpose the gentleman was rising; but the Chair thinks he always has the right to recognize Members for a parliamentary inquiry; and having answered that, then would be the proper time to make the motion which the gentleman proceeded to make, the Chair felt obliged to recognize him. If the Chair should be convinced that he was overhasty and wrong in that answer he would not be bound by it, but by parliamentary law.

Now, the question is whether the Chair had the right to recognize that motion. Of course, that depends entirely on whether the motion is in order or not. If not, then a point of order would lie against it, and the mere fact that the Chair recognized the gentleman would not make it in order.

The Chair thinks it raises a novel and perlexing question, arising from the fact that Mr. Berger is not a Member of this House; that he spoke only by the courtesy of the House; that no Member could rise and make a motion of censure; that he was not subject to the censure of the House like an ordinary Member, and therefore that a different condition arises. As to what the gentleman, Mr. Berger, said, the Chair can not judge of its parliamentary propriety, because by giving the closest attention the Chair was not able to catch consecutively enough of the gentleman's argument to determine.

At various times Members made points of order that it violated the rules of the House, and when a gentleman is speaking by the courtesy of the House without the responsibility and control which attaches to a Member and utters remarks as to whose parliamentary character a question is raised, the Chair thinks that the House has the right as a privilege of the whole House to decide at once whether they shall be a part of the proceedings of the House printed the next day. So the Chair overrules the point of order, and rules that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] was in order. [Applause.] Now the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming to lay that motion on the table.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the Chair was in doubt, and that there would be a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VOIGT. Would it be proper to make the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. It is in order, but the Chair would suggest that the gentleman wait until the division is completed to ascertain whether there is a quorum or not.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 91.

The SPEAKER. On this motion the ayes are 123, the noes are 91, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman from Missouri asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Missouri can take care of himself.

Mr. BLANTON. I will help him.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman does not need any help.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the motion to lay on the table preclude a motion to strike out the words later in the proceedings?

The SPEAKER. At first blush the Chair would think it did.

Mr. LONGWORTH. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would it also preclude a resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. If this motion prevails, does it necessarily prevent a later motion to strike out certain portions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think not.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, what are we to vote on?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 174, nays 122, not voting 135, as follows:

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I was not; I was called from the Hall shortly before my name was reached.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. May I be recorded as present?

The SPEAKER. There is no authority for that.

The result was announced as above recorded.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUHRING].

Mr. LUHRING. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there is but one legal proposition involved in this proceeding, and, fortunately, it is very simple. If Victor L. Berger, having previously taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and defend that flag, gave aid or comfort to the enemies of this country, he is not qualified to sit as a Member of this House. [Applause.] The issue has been joined by a most remarkable plea in confession and avoidance. He absolutely confesses the truth of the charges in the resolution presented to this House, but in that plea of confession and avoidance he wholly and willfully misrepresents the principles of the Socialist Party of America. The evidence taken at the Chicago trial, and which this committee has considered, consisted of over 5,000 typewritten pages. This was in addition to the hearings conducted by the committee. After having considered all this mass of testimony, I personally am convinced that Victor Berger is not only guilty of having violated the espionage law and having entered into a conspiracy for that purpose, but he is also guilty of treason, the highest crime known to criminal jurisprudence.

In the limited time I have it will be impossible to present all of the evidence, or even a considerable part of it, but there are a few outstanding things that lead to but one conclusion, if gentlemen need more than this remarkable confession to convince them, that Mr. Berger is unfit to sit as a Member of this House. The conspirators—and of that crowd Victor L. Berger was the dominating and controlling influence—were Adolph Germer, who was the national secretary of the Socialist Party; J. Louis Engdahl, who was the editor of the American Socialist, the party organ; Irwin St. John Tucker, its literary director and circulation manager; and William F. Kruse, who had charge of what was known as the Young People's Socialist League or, as generally spoken of, the "Yipsei" organization of the Socialist Party. We find the beginning of this conspiracy shortly after this country had severed diplomatic relations with Germany. We find Victor L. Berger and the secretary, Mr. Germer, with their heads together at the Chicago office, where they produced what is known as "Down with the war," an article published in the American Socialist, and afterwards printed and circulated as a pamphlet by the Socialist Party. Some 750,000 or a million, perhaps, of these pamphlets were circulated, and they were circulated as late as September, 1917. You will observe that the language of this production is in all respects similar to that of the St. Louis proclamation and war program, and I only desire to read a very short extract:

> The German submarine warfare does not threaten our national integrity or independence, not even our national dignity and honor. It was not aimed primarily at the United States, and would not affect the American people. It would strike only those parasitic classes that have been making huge profits by manufacturing instruments of death, or by taking away our food and selling it at exorbitant prices to the fighting armies of Europe.

Coming down to our declaration of war, on the 7th day of April there met in the city of St. Louis what has been characterized as the emergency convention of the Socialist Party. There were perhaps some 200 delegates attending that convention. Victor L. Berger was there, so was Mr. Engdahl, so was Mr. Germer, and so was Mr. Kruse. Mr. Berger, however, was the only authorized delegate to the convention. He was made a member of the committee on military affairs, which had to do with the writing of this so-called proclamation and program. Mr. Berger sought to impress your committee, as he did the jury in the city of Chicago, that he occupied only a very minor part at that convention, and that it was just by the "skin of his teeth" that he was elected a member of that important committee. As it was, he was No. 14 of the committee of 15 members.

He also stated that it was a convention the like of which he had never seen before; that there were various shades of opinion. He stated that he represented the conservative sentiment; that then followed a radical sentiment; and then a more radical sentiment; and finally a prowar sentiment. He insisted that he was decidedly in the minority. I could not understand, after I had reviewed this evidence, why a man like Victor Berger, of his dominating personality, of his forceful will, would be content to take a back seat in his party councils, when he had prided himself on being one of the founders and one of the organizers of the Socialist Party of America. Pursuing that thought and investigating it further, I found that the hand and the pen that wrote this thing called "Down with the war" ran all through this proclamation and war program, and I came to the conclusion, and I think this evidence bears me out absolutely, that Victor Berger was also the author of the St. Louis program and proclamation. Further than that, if you will examine the record you will find that when this majority opinion, as they call it, was presented to the committee, Mr. Berger's name appeared second on the list, immediately after the name of the chairman. I mention that because it is a straw which indicates the way the wind blew at that time there in St. Louis.

What, then, was the plan and purpose of this convention? What did they resolve to do? I have not the time to read the program. They recommended that the convention instruct the national executive committee to extend and improve the propaganda among women, because they, as housewives and mothers "are now ready to accept our message," and they also recommended that all taxes and all bond issues be opposed, and, third, "that the convention instruct the national executive committee to initiate an organized movement of Socialists, organized workers, and other antiwar forces for concerted action along the lines of this program."

I am now going to discuss briefly with you some of the things that they did to carry out this program. I have time to mention only one or two, because all they did from that time on was in furtherance of the plan to interfere with this Government in the prosecution of the war with Germany. One of the first articles appearing in the Leader, written for the benefit of the women of this country, was an article entitled "War and insanity," referring to the alleged insanity prevailing in the Army. It reads:

> That in the present war the number not infrequently reaches 40 to the 1,000 men.
> Think of it! An Army of 1,000,000 men might have 40,000 insane, more than are housed to-day in all the State hospitals of Illinois, Ohio, and Indiana.
> This fact has from time to time been touched upon by writers at the front. It is said that in France there are certain closed cars which are used for the purpose of transporting the insane away from the front, and that there are sometimes long trains made up exclusively of them.
> Capitalism, even in time of peace, is gradually driving the people insane.

There is also a poem by a woman named Lydia O'Neill, entitled "Friends of conscription," which is another vicious thing, and reads as follows:

FRIENDS OF CONSCRIPTION.

(J. P. Morgan.)

And so you approve of the plan, J. P.,
The plan of conscripting our sons;
And so you would send them across the sea,
To tackle the murderous guns.
Cold steel against tender young flesh, J. P.,
Hard steel against tender young bones;
And you—you approve of the plan, J. P.—
At so many per cent for your loans!

And how goes the battle to-day, J. P.?
How many thousands were slain?
How many blind eyes lifted up to the skies
In pitiful pleading and pain?
And how many curses of hate, J. P.,
And how many agonized groans?
And how many dollars were lent to-day,
At how many per cent for the loans?

And the war that comes after the war, J. P.,
Does it never loom up in your dreams?
For you know that each debt must be paid, J. P.,
Though maturity far away seems.
But what is our life or our death, J. P.,
And what are our tears and our moans—
The grief-stricken mother, the life without light—
As compared with a great banker's loans?

But the crowning infamy of all was this so-called article, "The price we pay," by Irwin St. John Tucker. It is the article that Mr. Berger said was most brilliantly written, a thing that he circulated in the Milwaukee Leader, a thing that he authorized to be circulated by the millions as a pamphlet. I read this quotation:

Into your homes the recruiting officers are coming. They will take your sons of military age and thrust them into the Army. Stand them up in long rows, break them into squads and platoons, teach them to deploy and wheel; guns will be put in their hands; they will be taught not to think but to obey without questioning. Then they will be shipped through the submarine zone by the hundreds of thousands to the bloody quagmire of Europe. Into that seething, heaving, swamp of torn flesh and floating entrails they will be plunged, in regiments, divisions, and armies, screaming as they go.

Then another article by Mr. Tucker, "Why you should fight." I wish I had time to read that thing. Then a piece of poetry entitled, "Cheer up," by Cary E. Norris, appearing in the American Socialist:

CHEER UP!

(By Cary E. Norris.)

Cheer up, boys!
Wave your caps and shout for joy;
For a kind, beneficent Government has bought 200,000 coffins for you.
It is not customary to purchase the coffin until after death.
Therefore, such thoughtfulness and consideration on the part of the Government ought to be fully appreciated.
Just think of the sad condition of the poor French and German boys; Shot to death, torn into shreds, broken and mangled past all recognition, and no coffin.
Boys, resist conscription no longer;
Go joyfully on your way to the trenches!
What if you do fail to return?
Your wives will be given a small pension and your children the privilege of paying 75 per cent of the war debt;
And you will have been provided with a coffin;
Unless you are too badly blown to pieces.
Fathers and mothers!
Why look on the dark side of war?
Cheer up!
Of course, it is hard to see the boys march into the whirlpool of blood;
But some of them may possibly return;
And you will always have the consolation of knowing that the ones who fell had a coffin;
Unless they were too badly scattered.
So, cheer up!
Don't be pessimistic and unpatriotic.
Girl, say "Goodbye" to your sweetheart with a smile on your lips.
Part of him may come back;
But if you never see him again try not to think of him with his arms and legs blown off;
What great holes torn in his body;
With his face crushed beyond all resemblance to a human;
Just think of him peacefully sleeping in the coffin provided for him by the benevolent Government and imagine that his last words were:
"We are taking democracy to Germany."
Then, cheer up!
And then cheer up some more!
NOTE.—In addition to the coffin, widows of enlisted men will get $12 per month pension, with $2 additional for each child under 16. If she can't take care of herself and children on this she can starve. No provisions are made for coffins under such circumstances.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUHRING. For a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think it wise for us to put this kind of rot into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. LUHRING. I want to justify the position taken by this committee, I will say to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUHRING. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. When a gentleman is arguing to show why a man should not be permitted a seat in Congress on this charge, is there any other way of letting the Members of the House know about it except by discussing the evidence?

Mr. LUHRING. I know of none, sir.

There is one more article having reference and especially directed to women that I want to read. Mr. DALLINGER, chairman of the committee, referred to it. It is entitled "Woman and war," and printed in the American Socialist, having reference to the women who encouraged young men to join the colors and fight for their country. Speaking of them this article proceeds to say:

Women soliciting for such a purpose—that is, encouraging young men to enlist—are only a step higher than women who solicit for the sale of their bodies.

I do not know how gentlemen feel, but, so far as I am personally concerned, if Victor Berger was responsible for nothing else but that I would vote to refuse him a seat in this House. [Applause.] It is a slander upon the noble womanhood of America, which red-blooded men in this House must resent by their vote. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LUHRING. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. All of that tended to oppose the raising of armies. I want to direct the gentleman's attention to a clause in that proclamation to the effect that should conscription be forced upon the people——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LUHRING. May I have five minutes?

Mr. EAGLE. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. "Should such conscription be forced upon the people, we pledge ourselves to * * * the support of all mass movements in opposition to conscription," and I desire to ask the gentleman whether at any time in the hearings Mr. Berger offered any explanation of that clause or whether it stands before us as a declaration in favor of riots and forcible opposition to the laws of the United States with regard to conscription?

Mr. LUHRING. He sought to make an explanation of that, I will say to the gentleman, which was as unsatisfactory as the explanation he made in defense of the article he wrote entitled "Bullets and ballots." Following up your inquiry, the evidence shows that there were so-called "Yipsel" organizations, made up of young men from 15 to 30 years of age. At a "Yipsel" convention held in the city of Chicago a resolution was proposed and adopted by the convention urging that all of the members resist conscription to the limit and, if necessary, face a firing squad. Undoubtedly that was the plan, as the evidence shows. Mr. Berger, in the years gone by, did not favor the Young People's Socialist League and did not care to have the young men interfere with the Socialist Party. But when this war broke out we find Mr. Berger exercising the utmost solicitude for these young men, urging Kruse, the organizer, to come to Milwaukee and organize several circles there. He advertised them in his newspaper, and I say to you, gentlemen—and the evidence bears me out—that that one thing was a school of treason presided over by Victor Berger, by Germer, and by the rest of this clique. Now, Mr. Berger contends that he does not believe in direct action and that he is opposed to all force, and yet we find him contributing to the defense of the I. W. W., whose members were on trial in Chicago, and in a letter to Mr. Wouri, inclosing $10, he said:

I admire the magnificent class spirit of the I. W. W.

When they were convicted he agreed with Bill Haywood that the verdict was a gross error. In 1909, as he himself stated, he wrote an article in which he suggested that the laboring men arm themselves to enforce their rights.

Here is the language of that article which appeared over his signature:

In view of the plutocratic lawmaking of the present day, it is easy to predict that the safety and hope of this country will finally lie in one direction only, that of a violent and bloody revolution. I predict that a large part of the capital class will be wiped out for much smaller things than the settling of the great social questions; that before any settlement is possible most of the plutocratic class, together with the politicians, will have to disappear as completely as the feudal lords and their retinue disappeared during the French Revolution. That can not be done by the ballot. And in order to be prepared for all emergencies, socialists and workingmen should make it their duty to have rifles and the necessary rounds of ammunition at their homes and be prepared to back up their ballots with their bullets, if necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUHRING. For just a minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is that the statement that Mr. Berger now apologizes for and says it means the right to carry a pistol?

Mr. LUHRING. Exactly. Mr. Berger would have you believe that his party is on trial here. So far as this committee is concerned, the Socialist Party was not on trial. Our inquiry was directed solely to the question whether or not Berger, either by spoken or printed word, gave aid or comfort to the enemies of this country. He was the dominating influence at the St. Louis convention, held the day following our declaration of war, and was author of the document known as the "Proclamation and war program."

He would not permit John Spargo, a representative Socialist, as a member of the military affairs committee of that convention to state the correct position of the Socialists, not only of America, but of Europe, and when Mr. Spargo presented a minority report which showed that historically it was the duty of the Socialists of America to support this country, just as the Socialists of Germany, France, England, and Italy were supporting their respective countries, this report, at the direction of Mr. Berger, was voted down, and the report which he approved was adopted by the convention. It was this report that Theodore Roosevelt characterized as treasonable and for the indorsement of which Eugene Debs is now languishing in prison.

That gentlemen may know the true socialistic creed as upheld by John Spargo, Charles Edward Russel, and others prominent in the ranks of the Socialist Party of America I invite your attention for a few moments to some extracts from the report presented to the St. Louis convention by Mr. Spargo:

Our guiding principle in all that concerns our relations to the people of other lands is internationalism. We are internationalists and antimilitarists.

But internationalism does not mean for us antinationalism. Nor has it anything whatever to do with the vague doctrine of world organization, for which no accurately descriptive name exists, symbolized by the picturesque ceremony of flag burning. This much-exploited ceremonial was a crude attempt to symbolize a conception of a nationless world.

We repudiate the claim made by some that loyalty to this nation is inconsistent with true internationalism. Those who say that Socialism involves the view that the working class has no nation to call its own, that all nations are alike, that there is nothing to choose between a militarist autocracy, and a democratic republic do not preach Socialist internationalism, but pernicious reactionary nonsense.

DIFFERENCE IN RULER.

To say that there is no difference between governments is at once demogogic and untrue. Between the old Russian régimé and the new is a vast difference, even though the new régimé is not a fully developed socialistic republic. Not to have a choice between them is to be a political imbecile rather than a social revolutionist.

Internationalism presupposes nationalism. It is the interrelation of nations. The maintenance of national integrity and independence is an essential condition of internationalism. This principle has never in the past been seriously questioned in our movement. It has been the guiding principle of our policies in the Socialist International.

INVASION WAS CRIME.

From this point of view the wanton invasion of Belgium early in this war was a crime against Socialist principles of fundamental importance. It was, furthermore, a blow at international law and good faith, the basis of whatever internationalism in world organization yet exists.

As internationalists we unequivocally assert the right of nations to defend themselves, their institutions, and rights.

As a corollary to that statement we assert the right of Socialists to participate in such defense. Marx, Engle, Bebel, Liebknecht, and practically all the great founders and teachers of our movement have taught this.

As socialists we are in general against war and in favor of peace. But we are not peace-at-any-price pacifists. We reject the doctrine of nonresistance, so called, as contrary to socialism and to sound morality. From the days of Marx and Engels our movement has stood for peace, because peace is normally to the interest of the working-class movement and to the development of socialism. But Marx and Engels clearly showed, on many occasions, that wars might, in certain circumstances, be defended and even advocated on the ground that the interest of the working-class movement and the development of socialism would be furthered thereby.

MARX URGED WAR.

It is worthy of note at this time that Marx opposed the pacifists of 1859 with great vigor, and waged an active propaganda to force England to make war on Russia. Marx was in favor of that war because he believed that it would stimulate political and economic progress and the interests of the workers.

To profess indifference to the result of the war now being waged, to desire either that the war end in a draw or in the defeat of the Entente powers with which this Nation is allied, is treachery to the principles of international socialism.

Furthermore, it is treachery to the democratic principles and institutions of America. The identification of socialism with this disloyalty to the essential principles of Americanism would destroy every hope of ever winning the great masses of the American people to our cause. We assert that socialism is not disloyal to the interests of this Nation.

Now that the war is an accomplished fact, for the reasons stated we hold that it is our socialist duty to make whatever sacrifices may be necessary to enable our Nation and its allies to win the war as speedily as possible.

The truth of the matter is that Berger is not a socialist. While all the leading socialists of Europe, men like Liebknecht, of Germany, Henderson, of England, and others in France and Italy were aiding their respective countries, Berger lost no opportunity to criticize this Government and hinder it in every conceivable way in the successful prosecution of the war.

Therefore, having given aid and comfort to the enemies of this country, under the provisions of section 3 of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, he is not qualified to sit as a Member of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. LUHRING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized for 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, of the committee of nine appointed as a special committee to hear and determine and to recommend in this matter, so far as I know, not a single member of it entertains at the end of the long hearing any doubt that Victor L. Berger, all during the time that the United States of America was at war with Germany, gave aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States, and in every way within his power hindered, delayed, discouraged, and interfered with recruiting in the Army and Navy of the United States, and thereby violated not only the espionage act which prohibits the doing of such things but also clearly evidenced the fact that his heart was in no sense American, but that every instinct of his personality, every desire of his sensibilities, was to help the central empires in every way he could short of commission of treason.

One member only of the committee of nine has not joined in our unanimous committee report, and his report is to the effect that he wishes the consideration of this question of the fitness of Victor L. Berger to occupy a seat here on the election held in the Milwaukee district, to be deferred until the United States court of appeals shall have passed upon his appeal from a judgment of conviction in the Federal court for a violation of the espionage law. He has the same views, so far as the committee knows, that we have as to the unworthiness of Victor L. Berger to take a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States.

Your committee were not influenced by the judgment of conviction against Mr. Berger in the Chicago court. He was tried before our committee exactly as if he had not been tried before the Chicago court. If the Chicago court had adjudged him innocent, that fact would not have influenced our committee; and it is equally true that we did not permit his conviction in the Chicago court in any way to influence us. Our work was wholly apart from the Chicago court proceedings. It was our business to determine, from the evidence presented to us, the worthiness or unworthiness of Mr. Berger to occupy a seat in the House of Representatives. In order to save time and expense, we considered as laid before us the complete transcript of the record in the Chicago trial, and thereby we had the testimony given both for and against him at that trial, and thus saved the delay and expense of bringing all those witnesses before us. But it must be said, in strict accuracy, that we were in no sense influenced by the event and result of his trial and conviction at Chicago.

Beginning in June and ending on October 15 of this year your committee patiently, from day to day, heard all of the evidence that was adduced, heard all the lengthy arguments that were presented, in an effort to determine the truth. And certainly, so far as I know, we sat in no sort of partisanship. No man upon the committee considered that he was acting as a Democrat, a Republican, a socialist, or a prohibitionist, or anything else than as an American. No man there was seeking to try the hundreds of thousands of persons in the United States who belong to the Socialist Party. No man was seeking to ascertain whether it was wisdom or folly that is set forth by the teachings of the Socialist Party. Every man on that committee sought to determine from the evidence before us one issue alone, and that was whether, after April 6, 1917, up to the time of the armistice, on November 11, 1918, Mr. Berger, a private citizen during all that time, did or did not give aid and comfort to Germany. The issue was specifically stated; the positions were clearly outlined. And this long record of over 3,000 printed pages shows clearly that, so far as the committee was concerned, that issue alone was allowed to obtrude itself upon us for consideration. And while every opportunity was allowed to both Mr. Berger and his ingenious counsel to develop their case, either in denial or extenuation or otherwise, still the committee adhered in its private conferences, in its public hearings, and in its personal interviews, to that one question of whether from April 6, 1917, when the American people, through their Congress, declared war, till the armistice was signed on November 11, 1918, Mr. Berger was by his actions, speeches, and writings loyal to the United States or gave aid and comfort to its enemies, and, if he were disloyal and unworthy by his conduct during that tragical and critical period, whether he shall be now permitted to sit in the company of loyal men in the councils of the Nation.

Now, we did not have anything to do with the wisdom of the planks in the political declarations of the Socialist Party. We expressly declined to heed the statements made by Mr. Berger and his counsel that we were trying the Socialist Party and its principles. We tried one individual, Victor L. Berger, who presented credentials from the highest constituted authorities in his State entitling him prima facie to a seat in this House, but who was charged with being unworthy to occupy a seat here.

And after four months of hearings your committee entertains not the slightest doubt that all during the war Mr. Berger was disloyal to the United States in every way within his power.

Before I proceed in any sense to the facts which you are most interested in, permit me to call your attention to constitutional provisions under which you will consider and determine what your proceeding here will be in the event you shall agree upon the facts and the deductions presented by the committee.

The Constitution of the United States expresses in prohibitive terms that no man shall be a Representative in the Congress of the United States unless he shall have been seven years a citizen of the United States, unless he be 25 years of age, and unless he be an inhabitant of the State from which he comes bearing his credentials.

Victor L. Berger unquestionably bears those three prerequisites. But, as has been adjudged in this House many times, and in the Senate of the United States many times, the designation of these three prohibitions in no sense implies that there shall be no others; but in saying that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of Members of such House, it implies, as has been held many times, that it may ascertain whether there be other disqualifications. For instance, an insane person, or a person afflicted with an infectious, odious disease, and so forth, might present credentials and bear the above three constitutional qualifications, and even then be properly excluded.

And there is an additional constitutional qualification that is applicable to Mr. Berger's case, provided you find the facts in accordance with the committee's conclusions. The third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution provides as follows:

> No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress who, having previously taken an oath, as a Member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

That was, of course, enacted as a result of the Civil War. It was enacted because many men from the seceding States of the American Union had sat either in the House or in the Senate of the United States prior to the war, and the intention of that amendment was to prohibit their sitting again. But, in anticipation of the hour of good fellowship that might come in the years to follow, that same amendment to the Constitution provides:

> But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability—meaning, of course, such disability incurred previously to the enactment of such statute.

When war against Spain was declared in 1898, and North and South united completely in national spirit, under one flag, whereupon such an era of good feeling did come along—and, please God, may it never be disturbed—the disabilities previously incurred were then removed by statute.

Of course, the Congress had no power and did not assume to exercise the power to repeal the constitutional provision itself, so that the third section of the fourteenth amendment stands now as the supreme law of the land, providing that no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress who, having previously taken an oath as a Member of Congress, and so forth, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or shall have given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof.

Victor L. Berger was elected in 1910 as a Member of the House of Representatives, and came here on the 4th day of March, 1911, and sat here until the 4th day of March, 1913. He was not excluded at the door because he was a Socialist. He was not excluded at all, because at that time he had done nothing of which the House had any cognizance that would have made his entrance here improper at that time. He served here two years and was defeated for reelection. He has been since March 4, 1913, a private American citizen. But the undisputed proof shows that during the time his country was at war with Germany he was treacherously disloyal to his country, and that by counsel, editorial, speeches, and pamphlets, he individually and as the head of one branch of the German propaganda in the United States, to wit, the Socialist Party, did everything in his power to hinder, to cripple, and to delay this mighty Nation when it had buckled on its armor and had made up its mind to resist the aggressions of the militaristic German Empire that sought to subjugate the world. He practically endeavored to hoist the flag of the Germans on every foot of ground in this country, and he was an agent of that propaganda, as this proof clearly shows. [Applause.]

Gentleman, consider now some of the undisputed facts. Victor L. Berger, Adolf Germer, Irwin St. John Tucker, William F. Kruse, and J. Louis Engdahl—those five—were the executive committee of the Socialist Party of America on the day when we declared war against Germany.

Victor L. Berger was born in Austria; Germer was born in Prussia; Engdahl was a Swede. They were at the head of the Socialist Party in the United States. Berger was editor of the Milwaukee Daily Leader, and some of the others were associated with him as writers on that paper. The official organ of the Socialist Party was named the American Socialist, which was printed in Chicago and whose title of ownership was in these five men. Some of the others of the five conducted the Socialist. Berger accepted before our committee responsibility for each editorial printed in the Leader and for the pamphlets printed at the headquarters of the Socialist Party in Chicago and did not deny the responsibility for any of the treasonable literature to which his name, with the others, was signed.

On March 29, 1917—less than 10 days before our country declared a state of war with Germany—Berger, Work, and Germer wrote a letter to each Member of Congress urging against declaring war against Germany or declaring that a state of war exists, and particularly urging that if the question of declaring war should be voted upon at all it shall be put to a referendum vote of the adult citizens of the United States, both men and women.

I mention this as showing the beginning of Berger's disloyal intent. He knew that for two long years the people of this Nation had weighed and considered the tremendous issue involved; he knew that the President of the United States had continued diplomatic relations with Germany upon a plane of such friendship, good will, and conciliation that our citizens were rather disposed to criticize his leniency than to accuse his severity; he knew that Germany had, in violation of international law, sent its submarine treacherously to sink the Lusitania and destroy precious American lives, and he had written no word to any of us and had written no editorial nor made any speech in condemnation; he knew that the Kaiser of Germany had declared and started that awful horror of war without consulting even the Reichstag, much less any individual in the Empire of Germany; he knew that every day this Nation remained out of that war the more sure Germany was to conquer Europe first and America next; he knew that anything looking to postponement of action by America was in the interest of Germany; he knew that all German propaganda in America had endeavored to weaken the moral fiber of this people, and he was in sympathy with and abetting that program; he knew when he wrote that letter that diplomatic relations had already been broken off with Germany, and that the next aggression of Germany in violation of international law and of our sacred national rights would call for a declaration of war for the preservation of our national interests and sovereignty; he knew there was no machinery provided by American institutions for a referendum to 100,000,000 people upon a question of war or peace; notwithstanding this, he began his efforts in aid of Germany's interests by an appeal to the different Members of the Congress of the United States not to declare that a state of war exists and to submit such question to a referendum of a hundred million people, for which referendum no machinery was provided and which would have consumed probably six months of time. That was done on March 29, seven days before Congress declared war.

At that same time this man called an emergency convention of the Socialist Party to be held at St. Louis on the 7th day of April, 1917. That was not a political year—there was no presidential, gubernatorial, or congressional election to be held.

its sole purpose was because of the critical condition with reference to war. Berger was present and was the leading figure at that convention. The five men, including Berger, called the emergency convention together. After this Nation had, on April 6, 1917, declared war, this aggregation of traitors promulgated a platform which for disloyalty and treason and brazen infamy should rank as a classic. They printed many thousands of copies of that platform. I hold in my hand one of the original copies. Those copies were printed at 803 West Madison Street, Chicago, the headquarters of the Socialist Party of the United States. They were circulated from that headquarters by these five men, or some of them in understanding with the others, continuously for several months after we had declared war. That Berger was a beginning and continuing part of the conspiracy of disloyalty and infamy is shown by the evidence that continuously, from our declaration of war until practically the time of the armistice, Berger was from once to three times a week a visitor at that office in Chicago and in constant consultation with those conducting The Socialist, the official organ of the Socialist Party, and distributing these poisonous pamphlets. Among other things this pamphlet contains these statements:

We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world.

In all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage.

No greater dishonor has ever been forced upon a people than that which the capitalistic class is forcing upon this Nation against its will.

And that platform, later printed in a pamphlet and circulated throughout the length and breadth of this land by Berger and his associates, recommends—continuous, active, and public opposition to the war through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power.

They said that the American administration and the American Congress were mere tools of the financial interests of America, and that we had plunged the youth of the land into a war of pitiless slaughter and blood and devastation to make profits for financiers.

In every way within their cunning power they sought to have that view read by the people of the Nation so as to weaken their morale, and by the young soldiers both before and after being drafted so as to unnerve their arms.

That was the beginning of that series of offenses and of infamies of which Berger has been guilty since his country entered the war against the country of his birth. He was born a Hapsburg political slave and, although he left Austria when he was 18 years of age and has resided in this free land since, in the time of crisis his sympathies were with the land of his birth; and he has used that constitutional freedom of speech and press which makes this the land of the free, as if that privilege were a mere license to treason.

And then, the conspiracy having been thus conceived and set upon its way, Berger wrote continually editorials in his daily paper, the Milwaukee Leader, in furtherance of the plan to aid Germany and to injure the United States. By his editorials, by the use of billboards, by printed circulars which were distributed by the tens of thousands, and by his speeches, Berger did everything to weaken the supreme efforts required by the United States to achieve an honorable victory, which was within his power short of taking gun in hand against his country. There is no other thing I can conceive of that this man did not do to aid Germany and to injure the United States.

The files of the Leader and the files of the Socialist show no word of condemnation against anything Germany did in this bloody horror of war which was precipitated upon the world. Is the invasion of Belgium condemned? No. It is a capitalistic war and wrong only for that reason. Was it wrong for Germany to violate a sacred treaty she had made with a peaceful neighbor, Belgium, and tear it up "as a scrap of paper"? No—that does not violate Berger's sense of ethics or national or international honor. There is no editorial in condemnation. Does he protest when Louvain is destroyed? No. Does he protest when Germany compels the civilian population of Belgium to march at the head of the German Army in order to prevent Belgian soldiers in defense of their soil from resisting? No. Does he protest against the wholesale destruction of civilian life in Belgium by the German Army to intimidate the civilian population of Belgium? No—such is war. Does he protest in his editorials or speeches against Germany's conduct in enslaving Belgian women to serve the purposes of German officers? No. The files of his paper are searched in vain for one single protest against such infamies. Does Berger, head of the Socialist Party in America, protest against the action of the German Army in enslaving tens of thousands of Belgian men and women and their deportation into Germany as slaves to work in the German factories to produce munitions with which to destroy their Belgian relatives? No—it is only a bad, capitalistic war, which ought to be stopped by letting Germany have her own way. Is there an editorial protest from his facile pen and Teuton heart against the invasion of France, the destruction of her fairest Provinces, the extinction of the life of a million and a half of her people, the looting of her factories of their machinery, the destruction of her means of rejuvenation? No—there is only the point that America must keep out of this horror in order to save our treasure and our skins. Besides, France wanted Alsace-Lorraine back.

Is there any editorial or pamphlet or speech from Berger of protest against the violation of international law by Germany in sending her submarine, "like a thief in the night" and in a wanton and cowardly and brutal manner, to sink the Lusitania and destroy the lives of American men, women, and children when they were within their acknowledged rights upon the high seas? No; but, instead, he contents himself to argue that as the United States has respected the actual and enforced blockade, declared under international law by England against Germany, so also must the United States heed the theoretical blockade, on paper, declared by Germany to extend for 1,400 miles around the shores of Europe.

From the day the United States declared war, April 6, 1917, until a righteous victory had rewarded our sacrifices, on November 11, 1918, you may search in vain this record and the files of the Leader and of the Socialist for any word of encouragement to the men and women of America who were doing America's part by our sovereignty and our institutions in that awful time. You will search them in vain, and you will read what Berger said in public speeches and interviews during that time in vain, for one word of encouragement to the patriotic men and women of America to buy bonds and support the Government; in vain, to find one word of sympathy to the band of noble women who acted as American Red Cross nurses and who visited the bloody fields of Europe to give aid and comfort to the wounded and the dying; and you will equally read in vain to find one word of protest against the horror of Germany's bombarding the hospitals and hospital ships in which the wounded and the dying lay upon beds of pain.

From the beginning to the end, with Berger it was a question of a "capitalistic war" to which he was opposed and of condemnation of the authorities who had had the courage and forethought to meet the aggressions of Germany in the only possible practical way; and every time Germany put forth a pretended peace offer—which would be only those times when Germany thought it politically expedient to do so—Berger was for urging the Government to sit down at once to the peace table to talk over possible terms of peace with bloody-handed autocrats who had plunged the world into blood and tears and starvation, which ultimately took the lives of 9,000,000 people, and which would have resulted in the abject slavery of the whole world and its subjection by German "Kultur" if the clear brain and sound heart and resolute courage of America had not risen to the preservation of the principles of civilization and Christianity.

On April 13, 1917, one week after the declaration of war, Berger wrote an editorial in the Leader, as follows:

The courageous men and women in the Socialist convention at St. Louis have adopted a ringing declaration against war, which, after the wording has been discussed and some verbal changes made, will become the official utterance of the Socialist Party, subject only to a referendum vote by the party membership.

There is surely no evasion, no beating about the bush in the convention's declaration. Every sentence is trenchant and forcible. The causes which led up to the war in Europe are clearly analyzed and the blame thrown on the contending national groups of capitalists. Modern wars, in the language of the declaration, are "made by the classes and fought by the masses."

I have already read to you what that convention's "ringing declaration" was. It said that—

We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world.

It further said:

In all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage.

It further said:

No greater dishonor has ever been forced upon the people than that which the capitalistic class is forcing upon this Nation against its will.

That editorial was written one week after the Congress declared war, and it glorified the infamous declaration written in part by him and promulgated by the Socialist Party one day after the Congress had declared war. Thus he gave what publicity he possibly could to that treasonable document.

On April 14, 1917, in an editorial in the Leader, Berger said:

A cool, scientific, Marxian declaration on war and militarism was surely the best thing that could be gotten under the circumstances, and we got it.

It is to be noted by the word "Marxian" that he refers to Karl Marx, the German originator of the Socialist Party; and it is to be noted that the Socialist Party in the United States during the war ran true to form by adhering to its German origin—this Socialist Party in America is another one of the huge German hoaxes—it was "made in Germany" to be used to weaken any other nation with which Germany had political, commercial, or war controversies.

And, again, to show the progressive order of insolence, insubordination, treachery, shrewdness, and infamy of his conduct, I now read you his editorial in the Leader on May 19, 1917, in which he says:

And now we expect that every Socialist in the State of Wisconsin—and every reader of the Milwaukee Leader who holds a red card—will vote for the declaration of principles and every demand attached to it.

* * * * * * *

And the fact that all the secret service agents, Baldwin-Felz gunmen, Morgan-Schwab guards, Roosevelt patriots, and Wall Street organizations find fault with that proclamation—

And so forth, intending clearly to implant in the minds of his readers that America had only mercenary motives in the war, thus intending to weaken the morale of the people toward its prosecution.

Think of an American citizen, the organizer, 30 years ago, of a political party in this country which, through prosecution and trial, has grown until it boasts of a million male members, being one of the five men to write this national pronunciamento when his Nation was in dire distress and when after two years of profound solicitude and common counsel the whole people had finally seen their duty and made up their minds that, God being their helper, they would go through that tragedy and that turmoil and death for the preservation of the priceless institutions of America! This man Berger, who was born in Austria in 1860, came to America in 1878, found work and welcome, freedom and opportunity, home and plenty, and then rewarded his American citizenship by seizing the first opportunity afforded to strike the hand that fed him, and by striving to crucify the Government and the people that have given him liberty, plenty, and distinction in this noble land of free opportunity.

In the same paper on July 3, 1917, he wrote:

* * * The seed of democracy was planted in 1776, but up to the present day it has not borne any fruit which the common people may enjoy. * * *

Think of that coming from a daily newspaper in a city of half a million people, reaching out in almost endless ramifications to a dozen States, at a time when we had just put the conscription law into effect and when our fine boys from farm and factory, mine and office, shop and desk, without resistance were coming to offer up their lives in defense of the country's unity and its flag—think of having such rank poison put into their minds day after day!

And in that same editorial of July 3, 1917, he says:

To-morrow the English lion will mingle his roar with the scream of the American eagle. And why not? Both are animals that prey; both are proper emblems of the capitalist rule.

In Berger's view it would have been all right if the scream of the American eagle could have been hushed under the talons of the German eagle; but he wished it not to be heard with the roar of the lion when the two had united and we were determined to preserve our priceless institutions consecrated by the blood of our fathers.

In his same paper, on June 1, 1917, he says:

It is a matter for sorrow to see Memorial Day, which is, or should be, dedicated to the memory of the heroes of the Civil War and to the legitimate lessons which may be drawn therefrom, used for the purpose of trying to delude the people of the United States into believing that the present war is on a high plane as a struggle for human liberty throughout the world—

And, continuing—

And now they prostitute the sacredness of Memorial Day by comparing this war with the one which the aged heroes fought. Memorial Day this year was uncommonly sorrowful. Men and women wept. They wept because our Nation has been needlessly plunged into war.

I can understand how a man, prior to our declaration of war, could properly say anywhere in the United States, "I think it is a needless thing for us to do," intending thereby to restrain us from doing that of which he did not then approve; but when the Nation had heard the argument, had considered the issue and determined the event in its own resolution, when it had sent its representatives here, and when they had considered and voted, and everyone in the Nation who was loyal was buckling on his armor to do the duty of civilization, how any man can thereafter denounce that thing as unholy and yet think he has a spark of loyalty or national honor in his breast passes my understanding.

In an editorial of June 9 he says:

No one should let the registration figures cause him to believe that the war is becoming popular in the United States. The mere fact that the young men had to be registered in order to get them to go is amply sufficient proof that the war is unpopular. They registered because the law makes it a crime not to register. They did not register because they wanted to.

The fact that such an enormous percentage of those registering claim exemption is also amply sufficient proof that the war is still unpopular.

The fact that the socialist papers are receiving a flood of new subscribers is another proof. Many of the people are at last realizing the truth that their only hope lies in socialism.

War is not only still unpopular, but it is destined to become still more unpopular as time goes on.

That is not all. In an editorial of August 17, 1918, he says:

Why should we permit our boys to be killed and maimed by the hundreds of thousands to protect the British commercial interest? Or because English profiteers make money out of this war?

And in a further editorial in the Leader, on June 9, 1917, Berger wrote:

Registration day is over. The next move is the national shame and disgrace of selecting men to be butchered for the financial benefit of the capitalistic class.

After we declared war, after we had floated Liberty bonds, and the great heart of the Nation had responded; after the conscription law had been passed, when the Nation was ready for the supreme struggle, but a year before we had fired a gun or had a soldier in the war area, but at the very time when the Kaiser's hosts were beating down the allied thin lines that stood as our only safety until our strength should be mobilized, and when the supreme war lord of the mighty German Army expressed contempt for the United States by saying that he did not care whether America went into the war, because the submarines could win before we could reach the battle fields of France, and at the very time when all American citizens should have held up the hands and fired the zeal in the hearts of our young soldiers, Berger is asking this Nation to cease its endeavors, to sit down at a table with barbarian autocrats who tore up a sacred treaty as a mere scrap of paper, and talk on terms of equality with those who had butchered the world and ultimately caused the loss of 9,000,000 human beings. Before we had fired a gun, before we had fully mobilized our Army, here is this American agent of German propaganda using the Socialist Party as an instrument, under constitutional protection of the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech, to do these things that would serve the interests of Germany. If his preachings had been followed it would have rendered impotent every effort of this Nation to do its duty, and our soldiers dead would have died in vain. [Applause.]

As late as August 17, 1918, Berger wrote:

Why should we permit our boys to be killed and maimed by the hundreds of thousands to protect the British commercial interest or because English profiteers make money out of this war?

Those are the words of an American citizen, uttered on American soil, after 4,000,000 of the flower of our young manhood were in the Army and a million or more were in Europe and each troopship was laden with our priceless burden as it plowed through the submarine-infested zones. It was after our soldiers had given to the world a new meaning to the words valor, initiative, and courage at Chateau-Thierry, Belleau Wood, and St. Mihiel, and only three months before our tremendous offensive in the Argonne had brought the mighty German military machine to collapse.

Prior to that, on March 26, 1918, just about the time when the whole heart of this Nation was alternately chilled with horror and fired with holy zeal as the last supreme effort of Germany to win the war before America could marshal her full military strength upon the shores of Europe for a supreme struggle, this man Berger made a public address at Milwaukee, in which he said:

It is high time for us to quit fighting. If we quit, the Germans will have no one to fight with and then there will be peace.

The intention was to weaken the Army of this country. The intention was to help Germany.

Can you conceive of a fine young man, 21 to 31 years old, who had in his possession a poster of a leaflet like those written and circulated by Berger, carrying this treason, reading it and then hardening up his heart to do a patriot's duty the same as he could if he had had a loyal expression from the man who was at the head of a great party? This was intended to discourage recruiting. It was intended to discourage everything in respect to the enterprise in which America was engaged.

At the very beginning of the war the following advertisement appeared on April 21, 1917, in Berger's paper, the Leader:

Oppose the war! Distribute Socialist Party proclamation just adopted at St. Louis convention, voicing unalterable opposition to war just declared by the Government of the United States.

And so, from the beginning of the war until he was indicted finally, that was his attitude.

I quit reading, in the hearings of the committee, his paper when I reached the place where he was indicted, because I thought the courts in due course would take care of his case from that time on.

My friends, as I conceive it, whether it has cost this Nation the $60,000,000,000 that Berger estimates, or $600 per capita, to conduct this mighty enterprise, or six hundred billions, or six billions, or nothing, is immaterial when measured by the duty to be done. This Congress weighed and considered and the people of this Nation weighed and considered our national rights and plain duty, and resolutely performed that duty, despite traitors in our midst, who were doing all in their power to prevent our unity of counsel and of action; and our people were not fighting for money or land or even for glory or self-aggrandizement. They were fighting because their sovereignty was grossly insulted, their national interests were involved, their security was in jeopardy, international law was violated by Germany to the injury of their country, as well as the rest of the world, their overtures were spurned, and because their safety and freedom for themselves and future generations called them to arms. [Loud applause.]

I do not know how you gentlemen feel, but personally I have no use on earth for internationalism, whether it is embraced in a political party platform or a peace treaty or in anything else. [Applause.] I am for America first, last, and all the time. I believe it is the profound duty of this Nation to protect its interests anywhere in the seven seas, even as it is its profound duty to respect the interests of every other nation on this earth anywhere within the seven seas. The vigorous assertion of our own national rights and due respect for the national rights of every other people are the beginning and the end of our international duties. I take no stock in that sort of internationalism that teaches me that I must love a Frenchman, an Englishman, an Irishman, a Dutchman, a German, or an Italian as well as I love an American, because I do not. [Applause.] I am tired of hearing this German-American, this Irish-American, this Italian-American, this Union Labor-American, this Socialist-American, this special-class-American false doctrine—as if a man must be something else than a plain American. I insist upon pure 100 per cent Americanism, where there are no favored classes or creeds, and where the noblest inspiration of each shall be the common good of the whole people. [Applause.]

Recently I took my young son to the State of Virginia. Several generations ago my ancestors lived in the colony of Virginia. Before that some of them lived in the old colony of Massachusetts. These colonies hold the remains of my ancestors. They were here at the time of the Revolution and they were of Washington's ragged forces. Every instinct of my mind and heart is American pinned to this soil, and I would fight with either my political or my personal life against those who would dishonor this flag. [Applause.]

I took my little son down to Mount Vernon, the home and tomb of George Washington, and I thought of the eight years of war, of bitter Valley Forge, and of glorious Yorktown. I took him down to Monticello, the home and tomb of Thomas Jefferson, whose brain conceived the Declaration of Independence and whose matchless spirit gave that inspiration of human liberty to all the world. I took him to Montpelier, the home and tomb of James Madison, who was the father of the Constitution. I took him to the tomb of Alexander Hamilton, in old Trinity churchyard in New York City, who shared with Madison that noble work and that glorious immortality. And I intend also to take that son of mine up to Massachusetts and lead him to the foot of Bunker Hill, where Americanism fundamentally as splendid as that to be found anywhere else in this broad land yet abides, and I teach him that whether he shall in life achieve distinction or remain in obscurity, whether he shall achieve wealth or be poor, the sweetest heritage he has, even as it is his highest duty, is always to be able to look with clear eyes at the silken folds of our country's flag and to say "Thank God I am an American." [Long continued applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Texas to yield some of his time now.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY].

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as a member of the special committee to investigate the eligibility of Mr. Berger to a seat in Congress I did not vote to exclude him because he was born in Austria, nor because he was a member of the Socialist Party, but because he was false to the flag and disloyal to the Constitution he swore to protect and defend. I voted to exclude him because he gave aid and comfort to the enemy when our country was at war and because he lacked the qualifications as provided by our Constitution.

Had the Speaker consulted my wishes when he appointed this special committee I would not have been a member. I was sitting with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE] when his name was mentioned, and while I was prevailing upon him not to withdraw his name, because he could not afford to shirk his duty, by name was read by the Clerk. I felt that I had special reasons why I should not be asked to serve on this committee, because I could not subscribe to the philosophy which attempted to justify opposition to the cause of my country at a time when the country needed the services of every person. I want to mention these matters, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, so that you might not misconstrue what I am about to say. I believe that a cause, a nation, and a people can only live because of the sacrifices either personally or collectively.

During the Spanish-American War, after graduating from two institutions of learning, I resigned my position as city solicitor and left my office for the purpose of offering my services as a private, and now when I look back upon that period I consider it the oasis of my life.

After Congress declared war I had 10 nephews who volunteered their services; all were college men except 2, and all became privates except the physician. A year ago to-day one of these lads lost his life in France. Another one has been lingering between life and death ever since the Battle of Belleau Woods, June 14, 1918, because of a shrapnel wound in his lung. Under his pillow at the hospital you will find a paper issued by the Government of France, and I want to read these words to you in this citation because they breathe a different spirit than that breathed by Mr. Berger during this war:

In Belleau Woods, on June 11, 1918, as agent of liaison for the battalion, he rendered the greatest service to the attacking units by reconnoitering in front of the lines. Always was ready to rescue the wounded who were exposed to violent fire. Citation in order of division. Croix de Guerre with star.

You gentlemen will be asked to pass upon this day which philosophy is right—the philosophy given to us by the Prince of Peace in the Sermon on the Mount, or the philosophy of Mr. Berger which breathes hate and discontent.

Last night I saw one of these brave marines who entered Belleau Woods with my nephew. The five stars on his breast indicated that he was with the Second Division from Belleau Woods to the battle in the Argonne Forest. This lad came out of this carnage of hell without a scratch, and I tipped my hat because of that rich experience and heritage permitting him to stand with shoulders erect and demand that you and I preserve this country for the boys who gave their limbs and blood.

I can not help but admire this service of sacrifice and must frankly confess that I could not be a fair and impartial judge in this case, because I firmly believe that this country can only be maintained by our sacrifices, and not the philosophy preached by the I. W. W.'s and those who believe in using bullets when they find themselves in the minority for the purpose of forcing their will upon the majority.

Thus you will see that I seriously question if I could be impartial and free from bias, but after the Speaker pressed the cup of responsibility upon my lips I was determined that my judgment in the case would, if at all possible, be based upon righteousness, regardless of my feeling in the matter.

Because of that feeling I am afraid that my colleagues on the committee were under the impression that I was leaning backward and attempting, if possible, to look at Mr. Berger's statements from his viewpoint. I know that I delayed this report for days and weeks because of my desire to give it full and fair consideration, but I want the membership of this House to know that your committee resolved every doubt in favor of Mr. Berger, and what I give you to-day will not be my ideals nor my philosophy, but words and acts of a man who comes to you and asks you to admit him as a Member of this House, so as to permit you to judge for yourselves whether he gave either aid or comfort to the enemy during the war.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, we began these hearings on the 11th day of June. I know that there has been some criticism and impatience because these hearings extended into days and weeks and months. The committee felt that they should give Mr. Berger and his counsel all of the opportunity to present his case in full, and our evidence contains over 3,200 pages of printed record.

Mr. Berger throughout the hearings held that we should have referred the matter of war to a referendum. He claimed that the people have the right to vote whether or not they wanted to go into this war, and that he was against the war, because Congress, and not the people, declared war. After he had repeated these statements a number of times, you will find the real Berger on page 300 of the printed records, when he testified in his own behalf:

Mr. BERGER. The people were dishonored. No referendum was taken on the war. The will of the people was not officially known. The capitalist class through its press overawed Congress, and the war was declared. The capitalist class evidently got the President before it got Congress; that is how the war came about.

Mr. MCLOGAN. If there had been a referendum would you then consider the war honorable?

Mr. BERGER. If there had been a referendum and if the Nation had wanted war, the Nation could have had it. There is no greater power than the referendum, but personally I would still believe an imperialistic war criminal.

Mr. MCLOGAN. You would?

Mr. BERGER. Surely this imperialistic war would have been criminal, even if a referendum had been in favor of it. The referendum, however, would have shown the sentiment of the people.

Mr. WELTY. Would you have opposed it, then, after the referendum?

Mr. BERGER. Well, we would have opposed it, just as we do oppose it now, as a matter of conscience. We do not believe in imperialistic and commercial wars.

Mr. WELTY. In other words, you would not be with the majority?

Mr. BERGER. We would not have been enthusiastic supporters of the majority. Personally, I have for a long time been a minority man.

That, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, shows the man who asks membership in this House. He is against the war because he thought Congress was nothing but a rubber stamp and the people should have a voice. We gave him all the opportunity that he wanted to show that he was against all wars, until finally a couple of telegrams were called to the attention of the committee, and here is what Mr. Berger said about the Mexican situation: "A nation which can not protect the lives of its citizens has no right to exist." That was his conclusion at the time of our Mexican border trouble. At a time when we had some differences with Japan and a cloud was coming over us from the East, because of some disagreement between this country and Japan, he had this to say in regard to the Japanese trouble:

The great mass of the Socialists would stand by the country to the last ditch in the event of war with Japan.

He denied those statements until he was confronted with them. But when the war came to the land of his birth it was a different condition. It is then that he learned that he was against all wars. He was against war because there was no referendum. Then he finally said, "Why, we were against war because we are Socialists." But what have the Socialists done in other countries where they had war? I call your attention to page 221 of the record showing the stand the Socialists took in other countries when their own country was attacked. The following is taken from the printed hearings when Mr. Berger was questioned:

Mr. WELTY. Do you mean that a majority of the French Socialists voted for it?

Mr. BERGER. They voted for the credit in France.

Let me give you the war program of the Socialists of Germany and the attitude that they took at that time with reference to the war. Here is what they said in Germany:

It devolves upon us, therefore, to avert this danger, to shelter the civilization and the independence of our native land. Therefore we must to-day justify what we have always said, in its hour of danger Germany may ever rely upon us.

And when it came to voting for the budget there was not a Socialist in the Reichstag who voted against it. Then, on page 232, Mr. Berger says this:

Mr. BERGER. The French Socialist Party was the one that stood almost solidly by its Government in this war, although there was a minority there also, which now has become a majority, in the French party condemning the war and this imperialistic peace.

But what did Mr. Berger say when he saw that the German Government was killing our men, women, and children within their own rights? What were the words he said just shortly before the declaration of war. You will find them on pages 12 and 13, volume 1 of transcript of Chicago record:

The policy of unrestricted and indiscriminate submarine warfare recently announced by the German Government is most ruthless and inhuman, but so is war as a whole, and so are all methods applied by both sides. War is murder. War is the climax of utter lawlessness, and it is idle to prate about lawful or lawless methods of warfare.

The German submarine warfare does not threaten our national integrity or independence, not even our national dignity and honor. It was not aimed primarily at the United States and would not affect the American people. It would strike only those parasitic classes that have been making huge profits by manufacturing instruments of death or by taking away our food and selling it at exorbitant prices to the fighting armies of Europe.

The workers of the United States have no reason and no desire to shed their blood for the protection and furtherance of the unholy profits of their masters, and will not permit a lying and venal press to stampede them to taking up arms to murder their brothers in Europe.

The 6,000,000 men whose corpses are now rotting upon the battle fields of Europe were mostly workingmen. If the United States is drawn into war, it will be the American workers whose lives will be sacrificed—an inglorious, senseless sacrifice on the altar of capitalist greed.

Workers of America, awake! The hour is grave; the danger is imminent! Silence would be fatal! Gather the masses in meetings and demonstrations! Speak in unmistakable tones! Let your determined protest resound from one end of the country to the other!

Send telegrams or letters to President Wilson, to the United States Senators and Congressmen. Demand that American citizens and American ships be forbidden to enter the war zone, except at their own risk. Insist that this Nation shall not be plunged into war for the benefit of plundering capitalists.

Down with war! Down with the inhuman social system that breeds war! Long live peace! Long live the international solidarity of the workers of all nations!

Here is what he says in the St. Louis platform, after war was declared. I refer you to pages 255 and 256 of the printed hearings:

The only struggle which would justify the workers in taking up arms is the great struggle of the modern proletariat to free itself from economic exploitation and political oppression, and we particularly warn the workers against the snare and delusion of so-called defensive warfare. As against the false doctrine of national patriotism we uphold the ideal of international working-class solidarity and human brotherhood.

* * * * * * *

The war of the United States against Germany can not be justified even on the plea that it is a war in defense of American rights or American "honor." Ruthless as the unrestricted submarine war policy of the German Government was and is, it is not an invasion of the rights of the American people as such, but only an interference with the opportunity of certain groups of American capitalists to coin cold profits out of the blood and sufferings of our fellow men in the warring countries of Europe.

It is not a war against the militarist régime of the Central Powers. Militarism can never be abolished by militarism.

It is not a war to advance the cause of democracy in Europe. Democracy can never be imposed upon any country by a foreign power by force of arms.

* * * * * * *

The American people did not want and do not want this war. They have not been consulted about the war and have had no part in declaring war. They have been plunged into this war by the trickery and treachery of the ruling class of the country through its representatives in the national administration and National Congress, its demagogic agitators, its subsidized press, and other servile instruments of public expression.

We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime of our capitalist class against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world.

In all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage.

No greater dishonor has ever been forced upon a people than that which the capitalist class is forcing upon this Nation against its will.

In harmony with these principles the Socialist Party emphatically rejects the proposal that in time of war the workers should suspend their struggle for better conditions. On the contrary, the acute situation created by the plutocracy during a war calls for an even more vigorous prosecution of the class struggle, and we recommend to the workers and pledge ourselves to the following course of action:

1. Continuous, active, and public opposition to all capitalistic wars, through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other honorable and effective means within our power.

2. Unyielding opposition to all proposed legislation for military or industrial conscription. Should such conscription be forced upon the people, we pledge ourselves to continuous effort for the repeal of such laws and to the support of all mass movements in opposition to conscription. We pledge ourselves to fight with all our strength against any attempt to raise money for the payment of our war expenses by taxing the necessaries of life or issuing bonds which will put the burden upon future generations. We demand that the capitalist class, which is responsible for the war, pay its cost. Let those who kindle the fire furnish the fuel.

The following are extracts from the minority report submitted at St. Louis when the Socialists had their meeting shortly after the declaration of war:

Throughout the war Germany has acted with brutal lawlessness and inhumanity, not only against her enemies but also against peaceful and law-abiding neutral nations, including our own. * * * The provocation to war, which this Nation has borne with a patience and forbearance which will glow brightly in our history, has been great indeed. No nation with power to defend itself has, in modern times, endured so much. * * *

To profess indifference to the result of the war now being waged, to desire either that the war end in a draw or in the defeat of the Entente Powers, with which this Nation is allied, is treachery to the principles of international socialism.

Furthermore, it is treachery to the democratic principles and institutions of America. The identification of socialism with this disloyalty to the essential principles of Americanism would destroy every hope of ever winning the great masses of the American people to our cause. We assert that socialism is not disloyal to the interest of this Nation.

Now that the war is an accomplished fact, for the reasons stated we hold that it is our socialist duty to make whatever sacrifices may be necessary to enable our Nation and its allies to win the war as speedily as possible.

Mr. Berger voted against this, and the proclamation which he signed was adopted by this convention. However, this does not say that the rank and file of the Socialists were not loyal during the war. Personally I believe that a large majority of the Socialist Party in America were just as loyal to the Stars and Stripes as the Socialist Party was to their own Government in Europe. We only find a few misguided philosophers who felt called upon to oppose the will of 110,000,000 people.

On page 57 of the printed hearings you will find the following:

Mr. McLOGAN. This is the American Socialist, the official organ of the Socialist Party in the United States, of Saturday, April 21, 1917, which has printed upon the first page in flaring headlines:

"Socialist Party proclaims unalterable opposition to war just declared by Government of the United States.

"The proclamation on war and militarism adopted by the emergency national convention of the Socialist Party held at St. Louis was as follows."

And in that part of the platform which defines their plan of action reads:

"1. Continuous, active, and public opposition to the war, through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power."

Mr. WELTY. What connection has Mr. Berger with that?

Mr. McLOGAN. Mr. Berger is on the national committee of the Socialist Party. At the St. Louis convention there was an emergency committee appointed to look after the interests of the Socialists during the war. Mr. Berger was one of those members. That emergency committee had power to print whatever they desired, but the reason I call your attention to this, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, is this: I want to show that Mr. Berger has not always been the fearless exponent of the antiwar crowd that he was considered at St. Louis; that in his paper he cut out certain offensive paragraphs of the St. Louis platform. In other words, he undertook to cover it up.

On page 60 you will find the following, printed in the Milwaukee Leader on April 13, 1917, of which paper Mr. Berger was the editor:

The courageous men and women in the Socialist convention at St. Louis have adopted a ringing declaration against war, which, after the wording has been discussed and some verbal changes made, will become the official utterance of the Socialist Party.

Certainly, no Socialist body in any of the belligerent countries has uttered a more courageous statement.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have been giving you his own words, taken from the printed hearings, so that it might not be said that I gave color because I do not agree with his philosophy. I might have read from other pages, all of which would only be cumulative evidence of a disloyal heart. All of you have copies of these hearings, and I shall not take up any more of your time on this phase of the case.

The evidence distinctly shows that the German Socialists were true to their own Government; the French Socialists were true to their own Government; the English Socialists were true to their own Government; and, thank God, a large majority of the American Socialists were true to their Government. The only men who were not true to their Government were men of the Berger type, who never understood our form of government.

Now, then, there is another matter I want to speak about while I have the time. Mr. Berger was convicted in Chicago and sentenced to 20 years because of the violation of a Federal statute. He said he had a "hand-picked" jury. He always spoke of it as a "hand-picked" jury, and his attorney said that the jurors were picked to convict by the marshal. Think of it! Under our statutes the jurors are selected by the clerk and some one of opposite politics to that clerk. The names are placed in a jury wheel. Neither Berger nor anyone else knew what names would be drawn from that jury wheel. They said they challenged until they absolutely could not challenge any more. The fact is they did not exhaust their peremptory challenges in this case. He said they did not want to be tried before Judge Landis, and filed an affidavit of prejudice.

We went through this record for days and weeks, and we were given to understand time and again that he did not have a fair trial in Chicago. He claimed that Judge Landis brushed this affidavit aside and would not listen to any evidence in support of it. If this was true it was a clear violation of Mr. Berger's right, but what did actually occur is only another incident showing that no reliance can be placed in any of the statements. To understand the man, my friends, you need only read this record. Here is what occurred: Judge Landis was charged with using certain language when sentencing a man for the violation of the espionage act which if used would show a prejudiced mind, and the following occurred when this affidavit sworn to by Mr. Berger came up:

The COURT (to defendants Berger, Germer, Engdahl, Tucker, and Krause). You have filed a petition here—at all events a petition has been filed here purporting to bear the signature of you five men, subscribed before a notary public on the 8th day of November, 1918. Do you know what I am talking about?

To which question all of the defendants replied "Yes."

The COURT. Who informed you, Mr. Berger, that this court, meaning this particular occupant of the bench, used this language:

"One must have a very judicial mind indeed not to be prejudiced against the German-Americans in this country; their hearts are reeking with disloyalty; this defendant is the kind of a man that spreads this kind of propaganda, and it has been spread until it has affected practically all of the Germans in this county; the same kind of an excuse of the defendant offering to protect the German people is the same kind of an excuse offered by pacifists in this country who are against the United States and have the interest of the enemy at heart by defending that thing that they call the Kaiser and his darling people. You are the same kind of a man that comes over to this country to get away from the Kaiser and the war. You have become a citizen of this country and lived here as such, and now when this country is at war with Germany you seek to undermine the country which gave you protection. You are of the same kind that practically all of the German-Americans are in this country. You call yourselves 'German-Americans'; your hearts are reeking with disloyalty."

Where did you get that?

Mr. STEDMAN. I want to object to the examination of petitioners as witnesses on the trial of any issue raised on this petition.

The COURT. Is this objection raised at the request of the defendant?

Mr. STEDMAN. I am representing these persons.

The COURT. Your objection is overruled.

Mr. STEDMAN. Exception.

Mr. BERGER. Judge, I am to be guided by my attorney.

The COURT. I do not want you to go into anything that may be involved in the case; all I am asking is this: I assume that you are a man who is interested in the truth. Am I right in that assumption?

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir.

The COURT. Now, you heard my inquiry: Who told you that I said this? You heard my question?

Mr. BERGER. Yes.

The COURT. And you heard Mr. Stedman object to that question. Does he object to that question in your behalf, at your request?

Mr. BERGER. He is my attorney, and I have no right to interfere with his way of conducting this case.

The COURT. Is that the answer of each of the defendants?

(To which each of the defendants replied, "Yes.")

The court further inquired of the defendants if they understood that all his question asked for was the source of their authority for the assertion that he had used the language quoted in the petition, and the defendants stated that they so understood it, and that they availed themselves of the objection made by the counsel.

The court then inquired of Mr. Cochems, attorney representing defendant, Berger, whether he had made any effort to ascertain the accuracy of the statement alleged to have been made by the court. Cochem replied that he had not.

The COURT. Is there anything you want to say in support of this motion?

Mr. STEDMAN. Nothing at all.

The COURT. The motion is denied.

I am asking you if the member of the bar, Mr. Johnson, now standing by your side, and who you informed me the other day was your authority for these facts, does he swear that I made use of that language?

Mr. STEDMAN. His affidavit is not there, but he does make that statement.

The COURT. Does he swear in this proceeding?

Mr. STEDMAN. No.

The COURT. Now, further, let me inquire, that language which this affidavit attributes to me in the manner disclosed by the affidavit, as I understood you to say the other day, is claimed by Mr. Johnson, the gentleman I have referred to, to have been used by me in connection with the disposition of the case of the United States v. Weissensel?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is correct.

The COURT. After the verdict and upon occasion of the imposition of the sentence?

Mr. STEDMAN. Yes.

The COURT. Mr. Johnson, do you now desire to be sworn to give your evidence as to this statement for the court to use on passing on the motion for a change of venue?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir.

The COURT. You are a member of this bar?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am.

The COURT. The motion for the order asked is denied.

Mr. CLYNE. Does Mr. Johnson appear as one of the counsel?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I am one of the counsel.

Mr. CLYNE. If your honor please, we have a stenographic report, if your honor cares to put it into the record, of what was said on that particular occasion, and we have the reporter here who reported and transcribed it.

The COURT. You may file it; not that it is of any interest——

Mr. JOHNSON. Your honor, I want to make a statement——

The COURT. Anything you desire to say about the facts will have to be made under oath.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to make my objection——

The COURT. Just a moment. This court, in dealing with the situation at this time, will have to, as it must be obvious—will have to adopt such rules and procedure as will tend to discourage the use of the change of venue processes authorized by the statutes of the United States as a mere vehicle for the conveyance of slander and libel. Now, anything you want to say about this you will have to present here under oath in view of your attitude, sir.

When this case was first considered by your committee, both Mr. Berger and his attorney repeatedly said that they had no opportunity to be heard on their affidavit for a change of venue, and that Judge Landis refused to accept any testimony, but, like an autocrat, brushed the affidavit aside and demanded that the trial proceed and forthwith impaneled a jury "hand picked by the marshal," who had their instructions before to convict the defendant. This, gentlemen, did not conform to our sense of justice, and all of us were inclined to doubt if Mr. Berger had a fair and impartial trial. In fact, the suspicion became so great that the chairman felt called upon to request the district attorney, Mr. Clyne, to appear before our committee to answer these charges against Judge Landis and the Government. In other words, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, what your committee wanted was the truth and the whole truth. Mr. Berger had one of the ablest advocates I have ever heard. He marshaled his facts and justified Mr. Berger's words and acts with adroitness.

When Mr. Clyne presented this record that I have just read in your hearings, we seemed to be getting the right light, and from that day on neither Mr. Berger nor his attorney denied the record. Just one other incident to illustrate the subject under consideration. After the district attorney gave his evidence on this branch of the case, the following questions were asked Mr. Cochems, an attorney for Mr. Berger, which I want to give you for what it may be worth. The following evidence appears on pages 834 and 835 of your hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. But in the statement which he actually made he said that these men who were taking this attitude toward the war and opposing the war were bringing discredit upon the other Germans who were upholding it, did he not?

Mr. COCHEMS. He said, "You are that type that crawled out of Germany to escape military service."

The CHAIRMAN. But I don't see anything derogatory to Germans in general by the point. It seems to me that your statement that Mr. Johnson, who was not willing to go on the stand to state the source of his information——

Mr. COCHEMS. Who is refusing to go on the stand?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. COCHEMS. There is no question about where he got it. He was the attorney in the case in which he alleges this statement was made, and summoned by the court, and appeared there in the same court.

The CHAIRMAN. But he didn't go on the stand?

Mr. COCHEMS. I didn't want Johnson to jump into a lion's jaw. I think he would have been a fool to do it. Mr. Berger thinks he should have, but I am not given to feeding lions with that kind of stuff.

The CHAIRMAN. But you think, do you, that on those sworn affidavits, without any testimony as to the source of information, the judge should have given a new trial?

Mr. COCHEMS. You did not have much chance of giving testimony that morning. It was the most impossible thing. I was a stranger to Judge Landis. He flung at me. He said, "Do you approve of this, Cochems?" I said, "I haven't read this. Mr. Johnson is counsel in the case. I don't like to answer the question, but I do." There isn't anybody in the State of Illinois or in the West that don't know this.

Mr. WELTY. But when you make a statement of that kind and file it for the purpose of having another judge, or disqualifying the judge, it seems to me the attorney who drew the affidavit and the witnesses who swore to it should at least back it up when they were challenged to do it in the court?

Mr. COCHEMS. I know what I would do, but I wouldn't be fool enough to tell anybody else.

Mr. WELTY. But if anybody makes affidavits to disqualify a man on the bench and they would not back that affidavit up by sworn testimony, they should go out of court, and an attorney that would do that ought not to be a member of the bar.

Mr. BERGER. There were all kinds of speeches of Judge Landis quoted in the papers. All kinds of them—and all of them showed intense hatred and prejudice against the Germans.

DID MR. BERGER QUALIFY UNDER THE CONSTITUTION?

Your committee considered at great length whether a Member of Congress, elected by the people of his district, who appears with the proper credentials, can be halted at the door and excluded from this House, even though he violated a State or Federal law. I believe in the event of violation of a law the remedy should be expulsion and not exclusion. I know that practically all of the precedents of Congress hold the contrary, but most of these precedents were given right after the Civil War and while the country was still in the heat and passion because of the war, and because Congress had passed a law requiring a test oath to be taken that the Member elect had not taken up arms against the Government.

In the Roberts case Mr. Roberts was excluded because he practiced polygamy in violation of the Edmunds Act, after a petition was filed in Congress signed by hundreds of thousands of our best women. The minority report in the Roberts case recommended expulsion, but because of these petitions Congress excluded Mr. Roberts.

I know of only one case which supports my contention, and that is the case of Mathew Lyon, who was found guilty of violating the alien and sedition law. A resolution was called up by Mr. Bayard on the 22d day of February, 1799, asking that Mr. Lyon be expelled. After some debate the vote stood 49 for and 45 against Mr. Lyon. The Speaker, declaring the state of the vote, said that—

The Constitution requires two-thirds of the Members present to expel a Member. The resolution is not carried. (See Annals of Congress, vol. 9, p. 2973.)

This, gentlemen, is the only case in point to sustain my contention. However, the more I consider the case the more I come to the conclusion that I could support a resolution to exclude in this case only because Mr. Berger did not qualify under the Constitution and not because he violated the espionage act. Any other practice under our Constitution is most dangerous.

How can you permit a Member to stand up and ask that another Member be excluded if you find that his credentials from a sovereign State are regular? It would do violence to our very institutions.

Your committee refused from the start to consider Mr. Berger's conviction and sentence to 20 years in prison and proceeded to investigate the case de novo.

The original section of the Constitution prescribed only three qualifications. Article I, section 2, reads as follows:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Both the attorneys and Mr. Berger admitted that if he did not possess the qualifications in section 2 of Article I of the Constitution he could be denied at the threshold. For instance, if he were only 20 years of age he should not be permitted to be a Member of this House, or if he was not an elector of his State he could not be permitted to be a Member of this House. But when he was confronted with the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution he said, "Why, that was nullified long ago. That was repealed during the Spanish-American War." On the 6th day of June, 1898, a statute was passed unanimously at that time, which reads as follows:

That the disability imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, heretofore incurred, is hereby removed.

In other words, there were certain disabilities resting upon people at that time who had taken arms against the Government. The third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution reads, in part, as follows:

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress who, having previously taken an oath as a Member of Congress or as an officer of the United States or as a member of any State legislature or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Mr. Berger had previously been a Member of Congress and had taken the oath of office. But it was argued that the statute removed all those disabilities under section 3 of the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That then existed.

Mr. WELTY. Yes; it uses the words "heretofore incurred." The attorney argued for days that the passage of that statute nullified the Constitution. Think of it! The "wets" may have some consolation, if that is true, by making this country as dry as a desert, and after it is dry the prohibition amendment would be repealed, according to that logic. The language of the statute specifically uses the words—

Disability heretofore incurred is hereby removed.

He never understood that word "heretofore." At least, all of the committee were under the impression and of the belief that that section of the Constitution was still in force and that it added a fourth qualification.

The words are "giving aid or comfort to the enemies." What do these words mean? I have searched high and low, and you know we have had very few people who were traitors to our country, and hence we have had very few decisions of the courts.

Before we consider the meaning of these words I want to call your attention to section 3 of Article III of the Constitution, which reads:

Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

You will note the words "giving them aid and comfort" and how the same words are used in section 3 of the fourteenth amendment, "aid or comfort to the enemies thereof." In the treason section a person can not be guilty unless he adheres to their enemies, "giving them aid and comfort." Under the treason section three things are required before a person can be found guilty: (1) He must adhere to the enemy; (2) he must give aid to the enemy; (3) he must give comfort to the enemy. In other words, he can not be found guilty unless it is first found that he adhered and gave aid and comfort to the enemy. Now, what is the plain meaning of these words, "aid and comfort"? Webster's Dictionary defines "comfort" as follows:

State or feeling of having relief, cheer, or consolation. Satisfaction, enjoyment. Something that gives mental or physical refreshment or invigoration.

The homelier, more intimate word suggests relief afforded by imparting positive cheer, hope, or strength.

The Standard Dictionary defines "comfort":

To give consolation, encouragement, or moral strength; to cheer, encourage, solace.

The Century Dictionary describes it as:

Consolation, solace, relief, succor, ease, help.

"Comfort" has a range of meaning not shared by the others, approaching that of pleasure, but of the quiet, satisfying, heartfelt sort; meeting the needs most felt as contrasted with consolation, it ordinarily applies to smaller or less-known griefs, and is more positive and tender and less formal, while Black's Law Dictionary defines "aid" as follows:

To support, help, or assist.

This word must be distinguished from its synonym "encourage," the difference being that it connotes active support and assistance while the latter does not; and also from "abet," which last word imports necessary criminality in the fact furthered, while "aid" standing alone does not. "Aid" and

"abet" are nearly synonymous terms as generally used; but, strictly speaking, the former term does not imply guilty knowledge or felonious intent, whereas the word "abet" includes knowledge or wrongful purpose and counsel and encouragement in the commission of the crime.

EXCLUSION OR EXPULSION.

The question was with us from the very start, Can we exclude this man, or must we admit him upon his certificate and then expel him? Your committee held that if he could not qualify under section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and under Article I, section 2, of the Constitution, giving these four qualifications, then he should be excluded upon the threshold, for section 5 of Article I says that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members." If Mr. Berger fails to qualify under the Constitution framed by the people, we can meet him at the threshold, and that is what the committee has done in this case, and we found that Mr. Berger gave aid and comfort to the enemy.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. WELTY. May I have about 10 minutes more?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; go ahead.

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. I yield the gentleman 10 more minutes.

Mr. WELTY. We know a man by his acts and his words.

We have a right to believe that Mr. Berger intended what he said. We do not want to judge him only by a word here and a sentence there, but statements made at different times under different conditions. I want to read only a few more extracts from the record so that you may be able to better judge.

What is the natural disposition and inclination of Mr. Berger? What has he done? As early as 1901 we find that he advocated the use of bullets if not able to secure reforms by the ballot. I read from page 315 of the record. I am simply giving this for the purpose of showing the character of the man. He has not changed.

Mr. KLECZKA. If the gentleman will yield, that was in 1909.

Mr. WELTY. Yes; in 1909. Thank you for correcting me. Let me read it so that the Members of the House may know that the leopard never changes his spots and that some men never change their opinions:

Now, I deny that dealing with the plutocratic class as we are dealing in this country, the outcome can ever be peaceable, or that any reasonable change can ever be brought about by peaceful methods and the ballot in the end. I predict that a large part of the capital class will be wiped out for much smaller things than the settling of the great social question; that before any settlement is possible most of the plutocratic class, together with the politicians, will have to disappear as completely as the feudal lords and their retinue disappeared during the French Revolution. That can not be done by the ballot. And in order to be prepared for all emergencies Socialists and workingmen should make it their duty to have rifles and the necessary rounds of ammunition at their homes and be prepared to back up their ballots with their bullets if necessary.

When confronted, he did not deny or excuse these words. He said he was not ashamed of them.

To show you how closely he is connected with men who are the enemies of this country, I want to read you a letter that he wrote in 1908. This was at the time when the I. W. W. were convicted in Chicago.

Mr. KLECZKA. If the gentleman will permit, that was on May 18, 1918.

Mr. WELTY. Thank you. They asked him to speak, and he wrote them as follows:

Thank you for your May Day greeting and for your invitation to be one of the speakers at your defense mass meeting held at the North Side Auditorium on May 19. I will not be in Milwaukee on that day, having another engagement of long standing. In order to do the next best thing, however, please find inclosed my check for $10 for the defense funds.

Frankly speaking, I do not think much of the Industrial Workers of the World and their tactics in the past, and I do not agree with syndicalism as such to-day—but I will gladly admit that the I. W. W. has stood the test of being a class organization infinitely better than the trade-unions. Gompers's cohorts have, in the main, proved to be the tail end of capitalism.

That tail end is now being used as a weapon of the capitalist class very much like the crocodile uses his tail.

I am beginning to believe that the I. W. W. (or some labor organization that will succeed it, but that will inherit its matchless spirit) is destined to take the place of the American Federation of Labor in our country and fulfill the mission in which the A. F. of L. has failed.

As for the rest, we all will have to fight a long while—each in his own way—before we can have freedom and industrial democracy in America.

Fraternally, yours, VICTOR L. BERGER.

Gentlemen, I need not comment on this letter. He admits writing it, and he still feels that he has a perfect right to be a Member of the greatest law-making body of a free people. You know what they preach.

Just one more quotation and then I will close. On March 26, 1918, at the time when Ludendorff was making his last desperate drive, at a time when the English did not have sufficient force to defend against those hosts, when the French were depleted and could not hold the line, when we did not have enough Americans at the front to support them, just a few divisions, just before we threw the marines to the front, the First and Second Divisions, he made a speech, from which I will read. It is found on page 351 of the record. He made this speech on March 26, 1918, at Turner Hall in Milwaukee:

It is high time for us to quit fighting. If we quit, the Germans will have no one to fight with and then there will be peace. The only war that we Socialists want is a war against the present Government; and fight against it from every point in which the present European war is connected. It does not matter whether it is Kaiser Wilhelm or Kaiser Wilson. One is as bad as the other when it comes right down to the slaughter of the people of the world. If this thing keeps on it will not be a matter of either side extermination of the other. It simply means the extermination of a civilized race—that is what it means. We Socialists will see to it that the slaughter of our men is stopped. The "war babies" will then die. They are living to-day on the blood of our soldiers, and there would be no war if it were not for the Morgans, Rockefellers, and others who have forced Mr. Wilson to declare war so that they could have more "war babies."

Supposing the mothers had sent that kind of a message to their sons at the front—

It is time to quit fighting!

This, gentlemen, was said when everyone knew that Ludendorff was making his last effort to drive on through to Paris. The French and English had their backs to the wall. We only had a few divisions of our soldiers there, but because of this expected drive all of the shipping of the world was for the time being stopped, in order to carry our boys to France. It was a race between President Wilson and Kaiser Wilhelm.

We were then transporting from 200,000 to 300,000 of our boys every month. The submarine warfare was a failure. Ludendorff knew that if he could defeat the combined armies in France he would destroy the morale and be able to dictate the peace. The race was on and the question was, Who would get to Paris first—the German or the American Army? The only ones holding Ludendorff back were the exhausted troops in the trenches. Could they do it? Who would win this race? Mr. Berger knew all these facts. He attempted to discourage not only the American people but the soldiers themselves. He knew that if we would continue to transport our troops at the rate we were then doing, that America would win, and he issued his command to stop fighting. "If we quit, the Germans will have no one to fight with." He was willing to sacrifice our own who were then in the trenches standing between Ludendorff and liberty in order that our enemy might succeed.

Oh, my friends, the boys whom we required to go and fight for us and make all sacrifices did not dare say these things. Shall it be said that we will permit disloyalty from anyone who will not support this country when we need the support of these people at home?

Now we come to the close of this man's utterances until his appearance before our committee. On June 8, 1919, at Madison Square Garden, he said (p. 355 of the hearings):

In America the capitalists not only own Congress, the legislature, and the courts, but, above all, they own the means of public expression and communication. The capitalists not only control all the daily papers and the big monthly magazines, but they also dictate to the theaters and to the movies and own the billboards.

I am reading only a few extracts.

The capitalist class will find that instead of orderly mass action there will be individual and direct action as a means of resistance. Instead of socialism they will have anarchism. Instead of electing men to legislative assemblages—instead of changing the laws of our country, as the Socialists propose—every rebellious workman will become a law unto himself and will use any means he can think of.

Gentlemen, the record is full of his statements; that this was a war for the benefit of capital and the poor man has to pay the bill. That might be true in other countries, but not here. The Sixty-fifth Congress, which he repeatedly said was controlled by the "capitalistic class," passed an act requiring the man of wealth pay as high as 80 per cent of his income to the Government to pay for this war, while the man with a family does not pay one cent of income tax until it is over $2,000 annually. If there is a poor man's country on God's footstool, this is; regardless of what these wild-eyed and long-haired philosophers might say.

That is the man that the voters of the fifth district of Wisconsin have elected and who now comes knocking at the door asking you to seat him for the purpose of destroying the institutions of our fathers. The committee has asked that you exclude him, and I hope that you will support the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE].

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the matter under consideration is founded upon a resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], on the 19th of May, 1919. I intended to read the resolution to this committee, but almost every part of the proceedings that I intended to read before the committee has already been read, and I take it for granted that you are familiar with the contents of them all.

I want to say that when I entered upon my duties as a member of the committee, placed upon it without my knowledge or consent, I did so with a free and open mind, without any prejudice or the semblance of prejudice, but with a full determination that I would be governed solely and wholly by the evidence that would be presented before the committee.

I know of no member of the committee who was approached by any person who was antagonistic to the interest of Mr. Berger, and so it is I do not know the foundation of the rumor to that effect which was given wide publicity by some of the newspapers of the country.

It was made known very early in the hearings that the testimony adduced at the hearing of the case in Chicago before the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois would not be relied upon by the committee in any sense, but it very early developed in the hearing that the greater portion of that testimony would be again admitted before this committee; and it was agreed upon by both sides that the evidence should be taken and considered as having been introduced into the record. That was done for the purpose of saving time, saving duplication of effort, and a great and useless expense. It was also agreed that the Member elect, Mr. Berger, would be given every opportunity to present his case from every conceivable angle, so that it could not be said that his case was railroaded through and he not given an opportunity to present his defense as it should be presented and in his own way.

That, gentlemen of the House, subjected the committee to a great deal of adverse and unfair criticism. When you consider that this case has no parallel in the Congress of the United States, and when you know that the testimony covers thousands of pages, when you know that a great principle is at stake, a principle that will not stop at the door of this House but spread broadcast all over the country, you will see that it ought not to be hurried, and that nothing should be done but fair and equal justice between man and man. [Applause.]

I want to say another thing. There is a great treat in store for those who have not read the able, eloquent, and forceful presentation of the case of the Member elect by his distinguished counsel, Henry Cochems, esq., of Wisconsin. I say, personally, that no blame can be laid at his door, for he presented everything in the way of evidence before the committee that could by any possibility be resolved in the interests of his clients.

Nor can there be any doubt as to the ability, learning, and versatility of the Hon. Victor L. Berger. In my judgment he is a wonderful man with exceptional talents. He has preached his doctrine in season and out of season, and is thoroughly imbued with what he believes to be the high and lofty principles of socialism. He has left no stone unturned to spread and propagate his doctrine through all the years to which he has devoted his signal abilities, and I want to say to you gentlemen of the House that he has convinced me that he is thoroughly honest in his expressed belief that socialism is the ideal state of government, and that it will be the assurance to every man that he will have his just and equal rights under the government by the people.

As to his right to expound socialism, or any other doctrine at certain times and under certain conditions, there can certainly be no doubt. But it must not be forgotten that every right carries with it obligations; obligations that must be observed by every citizen of the land, and most especially when his country is engaged in suppressing insurrection or revolution or is engaged in armed strife against any nation.

This is well established by decisions of our Supreme Court. They have been cited to you by the chairman of this committee in his able presentation of this case, and it saves me the trouble and time of bringing the matter to your attention. If any of the Members of this House are not familiar with the decisions involving the espionage law, I beg to commend the opinions of Justice Holmes recently handed down and which accompany the report of the Committee on Elections No. 1.

I want to say just here that socialism was not on trial before this committee in any sense whatever, and there never was a time during the hearings of this case when anybody would suppose for one moment that socialism was being placed on trial, any more than would the Democratic or Republican Party be placed on trial if any Member of this House should be guilty of the conduct which we report has been proven absolutely and unqualifiedly against the man who now seeks entrance into this House.

At the early stages of the hearing it was made known that the violation of any law passed during the continuance of this war, and especially that law known as the espionage law, would be considered an act of disloyalty. Not only that, but that the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and the third section of that amendment would be applicable to the present case. That was made known by the chairman of the committee at a very early date. The mere mention of the fact that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution and the third section of that amendment would be applicable to this case brought immediately from the distinguished counsel from Wisconsin the surprising statement, to my way of thinking, that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States had been repealed by an act of the Congress in the year 1898. It was contended that Victor L. Berger should be given his seat in this House and placed on an equality with every other duly elected Member of the House. It was contended that the third section of the fourteenth amendment did not apply in any sense. Permit me to say, gentlemen, that, for myself, I am firmly convinced that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States has never been repealed, and I challenge any person to cite me to where the machinery for the repeal of the fourteenth amendment or any part thereof was ever started by the proper authorities. The third section of the fourteenth amendment is just as much a part of the fundamental law to-day as it was when it was placed there, and can be repealed or amended only as provided in the Constitution itself.

Since I am firmly grounded in my belief that the third section of the fourteenth amendment applies in this proceeding, I have asked the question, "Can my friend, the Hon. Victor L. Berger, comply with all of the provisions of the Constitution, and especially of the section to which I have referred, and has he complied with the laws passed by this Congress during the continuance of the war, especially the espionage law?" If he can answer that question affirmatively, then he is just as much entitled to a seat in this House as any other man within the sound of my voice, and I know of no person who would be more willing and eager to vote affirmatively upon that proposition than I, because I will say to you now that I like the man, and I like his family, and the only thing that I dislike is his attitude toward our Government during the great World War, and I have had the pleasure of telling him that to-day.

The St. Louis platform was passed after the declaration of war was made by this Congress, and in that platform we find one expression to which I want to call attention, beside the many that have been brought to your notice by other members of the committee. In that platform we find the following language:

> We are unalterably opposed to the war just declared by the United States.

That, to me, is one of the best hammers that we can use to drive home to this gentleman the fact that he is not a fit man to have a seat in this House, because he was one of the framers of the platform. The very words of that platform would convince any man who will look at it that the convention knew at the time it passed that resolution that war had been already declared, and, therefore, it was their bounden duty, as well as the duty of every other citizen in this land from that time on, to give to this country every vestige of effort they could put forth in order to put force and vigor behind the war in which this Government was then engaged, and put down, to my mind, the greatest despot that ever ruled over the destinies of a civilized people. [Applause.]

I want to know if the words "unalterably opposed to this war" would give "aid or comfort" to the enemies of the United States? I ask you gentlemen, would that declaration give "aid or comfort" to the United States? How does that declaration or sentiment appeal to you, Members of the Congress of the United States, you who are in part responsible for the declaration of war against the Imperial German Government; you who are in part responsible for what is known as the conscription law? One does not need to read the writings of the Hon. Victor L. Berger and strain construction in order to bring his mind to the unwavering conclusion that not a single article that has been read in your hearing, not a single editorial that has been written during the continuance and before this war by this man, could in any sense be resolved as an "aid or comfort" to the Government of the United States, and therefore must be "aid or comfort" to the enemies of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. ROSE. I would like to make my statement first——

Mr. BLANTON. Just for one question.

Mr. ROSE. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The defendant in his speech stated that the Congress of the United States would be better off if we had more Socialists among the Membership. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he ever heard a Socialist Member of Congress who could speak the English language distinctly?

Mr. ROSE. In answer to that question I desire to make known to the gentleman that I am not considering socialism in any sense, and let me say here to the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROSE. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. DALLINGER. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to say to the gentlemen of the House we had better all have a care to what is going on at this time. [Applause.]

Many of you know just as well as I do that socialism is in the atmosphere. It has spread wider than I ever had any conception it would. Gentlemen of this Congress, I want to say to you the time is fast approaching when we are bound to take notice of what is going on. I have never for one moment attributed to the gentleman, the Member elect of this House, Mr. Berger, an indorsement of all Karl Marx has said with reference to socialism. I do not believe, and I do not want to believe, that he does not believe in an Almighty God. I do not want to believe that he wants to put down humanity and all government. I can not believe that, and my association with the man has never led me to any such conclusion as that.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSE. I would rather not yield until I have finished my statement, if the gentleman will excuse me. We have been referred to the famous "Ballots and bullets" editorial. I did not intend to make any comment on that except to say I would like to have you know that the gentleman himself has already stated that his opinions and views have changed since that, and yet in this open letter that he has sent to every Member of this Congress he tells in so many words, "I have nothing to take back from the speeches I have made or from the articles I have written." Both of those statements can not be altogether true, and I leave that for you to decide. I do not intend to ask a single man to vote as I expect to vote. I have not tried to induce any Member to believe as I believe. The justification for some of the utterances that have been made is on the ground that some distinguished Members of this Congress have inveighed against conscription. I regret, gentleman, exceedingly, that a man of the high and lofty ideals of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] should ever be used to bolster up the cause of a good man gone wrong. Without any disparagement to any of the great men of the Democratic Party who have been chosen as Speaker of the House of Representatives, I want to say to you that for learning, experience, ability, fair dealing, for patroitism, and for love of country, not a man in this country can surpass the Hon. CHAMP CLARK of Missouri. [Applause.]

I think that man has made a place for himself among the great men of this country, and I am sure that history will give him a high place in the niche of fame. And yet he is used here to justify remarks when all of us know that the men who voted against the war and that the men who voted against conscription have not allowed an hour or a moment to pass by without being ready to give the last ounce of energy that they can bring to bear, every ounce of loyalty and patriotism within them, to back up this country in the great fight that it has made—not one of those men has ever been found wanting, and it grieves me to have men of that character placed upon a plane that they were at one time against the Government that they so much love. [Applause.] The finding of the committee meets with my approval, and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I may be permitted to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request, that I may revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RANDALL]. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the majority of the Members of this body are aware that since the Committee on Elections has presented its report recommending the exclusion of Victor L Berger from membership in the House that a considerable part of the press of the country has freely criticized the committee for failure to bring in its report more promptly.

Because Victor L. Berger was accused of violating the espionage act and was found guilty and sentenced in February, 1919, to 20 years in prison, and on the supposition that the testimony taken at this trial was available for the use of the committee, its members are charged with tardiness in bringing out its report, "timidity, and a disinclination to offend somebody or some class in the community."

The members of the Committee on Elections expect criticism, but justice to themselves demands that the House of Representatives know the facts. As stated in its report, the committee decided at the outset of the hearings to determine the eligibility or lack of eligibility of Victor L. Berger on the merits of the case and to ignore his conviction and sentence in Federal court. To save time and expense it was decided to place before the committee in its entirety the testimony taken at the so-called Chicago trial. It also decided to have placed before it the record of the case as presented to the court of appeals. Due to delay in the printing of this testimony, which delay was not the fault of the committee, copies of this record were not secured until early in September. Meanwhile, the committee had proceeded with its hearings in as orderly and expeditious a manner as possible.

The question of excluding or admitting a Member elect to a seat in the House is one of great importance at any time, and particularly when the Member elect's eligibility is questioned on the ground of disloyalty to the Government.

Therefore the committee has no apologies to make for what is termed delay in reaching its conclusion. Its report is not based on passion or prejudice. It is not based on fear or favor. The members sought for the right and the truth, and have endeavored to bring in a report founded on conscience and justice.

In determining the eligibility of Representative elect Berger a vast amount of testimony was introduced concerning the development of socialism. Berger constantly proclaimed that in opposing war he was loyal to the tenets of international socialism and voicing its creed. In fact, he justified his acts, his writings, and his utterances by throwing the mantle of socialism around himself. He reiterates and his whole conduct and testimony in the hearings charges that an attempt was being made to exclude him because he is a socialist. The fact that he is a socialist is no concern of your committee, other than it caused the members to weigh and interpret the testimony presented to it with extraordinary care. As is pointed out in the committee's report, when Victor L. Berger and Meyer London were elected and seated in previous Congresses their eligibility was not challenged because they were socialists.

When the European war began the socialists of other countries, including the majority socialistic party of Germany, strongly supported their various Governments. In fact, no more loyal support was given to any nation than that received by the Imperial German Government from the socialists led by Phillip Scheideman. Berger is the leader and one of the founders of the American Socialist Party. A member of the party for many years, he has risen to high rank in its councils. In April, 1917, when Congress passed the joint resolution declaring that a state of war existed between the United States and the Imperial German Government, Berger was a member of the executive committee, and such committee had called the emergency national convention of the Socialist Party, which convened in St. Louis on April 7, 1917.

Berger was present and was a member of the committee that drafted, reported, and secured the adoption of "Proclamation and War Program," a document that was later characterized by ex-President Roosevelt as "treason to the United States." On April 14, 1917, the Milwaukee Leader in an editorial characterized this report as a "cool, scientific Marxian declaration."

Among other statements, this "Proclamation and War Program" contained the following:

The American people did not want and do not want this war. They have not been consulted about the war and have had no part in declaring war. They have been plunged into this war by the trickery and treachery of the ruling class of the country through its representatives in the national administration and National Congress, its demagogic agitators, its subsidized press, and other servile instruments of public expression.

We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world.

In all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage.

No greater dishonor has ever been forced upon a people than that which the capitalist class is forcing upon this Nation against its will.

* * * * * * *

We recommend to the workers and pledge ourselves to the following course of action:

Continuous, active, and public opposition to the war through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power.

Unyielding opposition to all proposed legislation for military or industrial conscription. Should such conscription be forced upon the people, we pledge ourselves to continuous efforts for the repeal of such laws and to the support of all mass movements in opposition to conscription. We pledge ourselves to oppose with all our strength any attempt to raise money for payment of war expense by taxing the necessaries of life or issuing bonds which will put the burden upon future generations.

(Printed hearings, vol. 2, p. 119.)

When this proclamation and war program was promulgated our country was at war. American rights had been invaded, the lives of defenseless men and women had been ruthlessly taken, and property destroyed. Berger's first thought should have been for the welfare of our country. He had the opportunity of expressing his choice, for John Spargo, a delegate from Vermont and a member of the Socialist national committee, had brought in a minority report advocating that the Socialist Party support its Government in the prosecution of the war as the Socialist Parties in other countries had done.

In this report occurs the following:

Our guiding principle in all that concerns our relation to the people of other lands is internationalism. We are internationalists and antimilitarists.

But internationalism does not mean for us antinationalism. * * * We repudiate the claim made by some that loyalty to this Nation is inconsistent with true internationalism. Those who say that socialism involves the view that the working class has no nation to call its own; that all nations are alike; that there is nothing to choose between a militarist autocracy and a democratic republic, do not preach socialist internationalism, but pernicious reactionary nonsense. * * *

Internationalism presupposes nationalism. It is the interrelation of nations. The maintenance of national integrity and independence is an essential condition of internationalism. * * * As internationalists we unequivocally assert the right of nations to defend themselves, their institutions and rights.

As a corollary to that statement we assert the right of socialists to participate in such defense. Marx, Engle, Bebel, Liebknecht, and particularly all the great founders and teachers of our movement have taught this. * * *

Throughout the war Germany has acted with brutal lawlessness and inhumanity, not only against her enemies but also against peaceful and law-abiding neutral nations, including our own. * * * The provocation to war, which this Nation has borne with a patience and forbearance which will glow brightly in our history, has been great, indeed. No nation with power to defend itself has, in modern times, endured so much. * * *

To profess indifference to the result of the war now being waged, to desire either that the war end in a draw or in the defeat of the Entente Powers with which this Nation is allied, is treachery to the principles of international socialism.

Furthermore, it is treachery to the democratic principles and institutions of America. The identification of socialism with this disloyalty to the essental principles of Americanism would destroy every hope of ever winning the great masses of the American people to our cause. We assert that socialism is not disloyal to the interest of this Nation.

Now that the war is an accomplished fact, for the reasons stated we hold that it is our Socialist duty to make whatever sacrifices may be necessary to enable our Nation and its allies to win the war as speedily as possible.

However, Spargo's report was voted down, Berger voting against it, and the "proclamation and war program" to which Berger signed his name was adopted. Berger took the position that the welfare of the international Socialists was of more importance than the welfare of the United States. Berger chose to place his obligations to internationalism above the obligations imposed upon him when he swore allegiance to the United States, the country of his adoption.

Not content with that, on December 30, 1917, Berger published an editorial in the Milwaukee Leader, entitled "The party will stand no wobbling," plainly designed to intimidate Daniel W. Hoan, the Socialist mayor of the city of Milwaukee, who doubted whether he could subscribe to the Socialist war program without violating his oath of office.

Time does not permit reference to many other editorials in the Milwaukee Leader that may be found in the hearings, but it must be remembered that Victor L. Berger, before your committee, assumed full responsibility for their publication. However, your attention is directed to the time on July 18, 1917, when the Government was preparing to float a Liberty loan, that then the Milwauke Leader referred to the repudiation of the war-debts plank in the St. Louis platform as a sentiment that would "gain rather wide popularity as time went on."

At this time permit me to say that notwithstanding this pernicious doctrine promulgated by the Milwaukee Leader, with the approval of Victor L. Berger, and widely circulated by his misguided followers, that the State of Wisconsin has a record second to no State in the Union for going "over the top" in subscriptions to Liberty and Victory loans, and other war funds; that my State had probably the lowest percentage of delinquents in draft registration of any State in the Union; that the district that I have the honor to represent led in every war activity [applause]; that the plan of the "patriot's fund" for providing funds for Red Cross, Knights of Columbus, Salvation Army, Y. M. C. A., and other war welfare work, originated in my home city, and was widely adopted throughout the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. DALLINGER. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

In his open letter to the Members of this House, and in his statements and presentation of his evidence to your committee, Mr. Berger and his counsel justify his writings and utterances under the freedom of speech and the press guaranteed by the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Necessarily, he contends that any attempt to deprive him of a seat in Congress is a violation of this guarantee. The law on this branch of the question is clearly set forth in your committee's report.

Mr. Berger boasts, "I have always prided myself on strict obedience to laws, even when I did not like them." The espionage act, which, he complains, violates the first amendment, was duly passed by Congress and became the supreme law of the land. This act has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be constitutional. Boasting obedience to constituted authority, how can Mr. Berger now charge that he has been deprived of his constitutional right?

Mr. Berger is an exponent of the mistaken doctrine that there are no limitations to "free speech" under the Constitution as amended. He preaches and predicts peaceful evolution, which, in the last analysis, is revolution. He is an apostle of the idea that he can agitate for the complete overthrow of our present form of Government and at the same time retain all his rights and privileges under that Government. Declaring that he is opposed to violence, he testifies that "the I. W. W. at least has the class instinct, if nothing else," and that "I have preferred the I. W. W. to Sam Gompers and his adjutants in many ways. Sam Gompers of late has become the abject and absolute tool of the capitalists," that "traitors and seditionists the I. W. W. are not," and, under date of May 6, 1918, writes the secretary of the I. W. W. inclosing $10 for the defense funds, and indorses its matchless spirit.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman give the date, the year?

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. Nineteen hundred and eighteen.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. May I have two minutes additional?

Mr. DALLINGER. I will yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. Our Government is founded on the great idea that the individual should be allowed a maximum of freedom and opportunity with due recognition of the rights and privileges of others. Our Government gives every individual complete freedom to voice his wrongs and find redress for his grievances as long as he confines himself to proper limits. An individual can not slander or libel another to avenge an injury, fancied or real. One may not maim or slay another to seek justice for himself. Certain sharp limitations are placed on freedom of speech. Berger undertook to place himself outside of the limitations. Knowing that the espionage act had full force and effect, he sought to hinder, obstruct, and embarrass the Government of the United States in its conduct of the war and thus gave aid or comfort to its enemies.

Berger sanctioned and was a party to promulgating the declaration "We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world." He declared "that the 'capitalistic interests' brought on the war," and that "the President thought it his duty to do as the capitalists wanted."

That this man should now be declared eligible to a seat in the House of Representatives is beyond comprehension. The facts are undisputed; the law is clear and plain. Victor L. Berger should be excluded. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I wish there was some way open, some safe and solid ground upon which I might stand now, to defend this man about whom so many speeches have been made and sentiments expressed to-day, for it is always my disposition by nature to like to be with the fellow who is in greatest trouble, or the under dog, to speak it homely. I say if there were any way possible open to me to pursue that course it would agree with my disposition and feelings. I feel no desire to interfere with the laudable ambitions of any man. I had rather exercise myself in an endeavor to assist him in the attainment of the coveted goal than to do aught that might retard. The disappointments, tribulations, and sorrows of this melancholy vale are sufficiently great at best, as that it ill becomes any man to foster or cherish ill will toward any of his fellows. To that end I should hail with delight the time when the barriers which have been builded between the various grades of society, as determined by the character of the vocation pursued by the individual, shall have been torn away, and in their stead altars reared where homage shall be paid and sacrifice made only to the gracious God of universal good will.

But when great questions are at stake, involving the welfare and well-being of a great people, as a competent general will purposely sacrifice a part of his troops that a greater advantage may be gained, leading to ultimate victory, so the Nation must sacrifice the personal aspirations of individuals that a higher beneficence for all the people may accrue.

To have a seat in this body and have to do with the formulation of the principles and policy that have for their purpose the welfare and well-being of all the people is indeed a most commendable ambition. But this is an American body, and he who sits here must be all American so long as our present fundamental law is intact. [Applause.]

I am persuaded that the American people have a divine mission to perform in the world, which is the maintenance of the faith of our fathers. The highest destiny of our Nation and the welfare of our people are grounded in that faith. There was a divinity that shaped their ends. Monarchy for them held no future promise. Under that system a man or woman born in the humbler walks of life could never hope to rise above them. Position and power were not granted as a reward of merit, but followed as a consequence of high birth. As a result, the best, the noblest, and the most royal blood in the land was held powerless in the iron grip of aristocracy. The New World, as yet unsullied by the dross of kings, beckoned for them to come, and offered to them its sweeping plains, its sublime mountains, its majestic streams, its boundless forests, its variegated climate as a place to build a home for the birth and nurture of civil and religious liberty. For that reason they bade adieu to their loved homes in old England, severed the thousand natural ties that bound them thereto, braved the terrors of the treacherous seas, blazed their way through the trackless forests, all that they might drink deep from the golden cup of independence. But autocracy, high on her gilded throne, closed her proud ears to the loud shouts of freedom and sought with cruel oppression to block the onward march of the new civilization. And after more than a century of untold toil and suffering they finally, those hardy, God-fearing, old pioneers, finally defied the relentless machinations of royalty, threw off the galling yoke of despotic bondage, and established here the highest type of government of which the mind of man, aided by divinity, is able to conceive. [Applause.]

It is to the maintenance of that Government in the establishment of which our fathers paid such full measure of devotion that we to-day stand unalterably committed. And if in that faith our Nation was conceived and brought forth, it is in that faith it must live and achieve its highest destiny. That faith is best expressed in the Constitution of the United States of America. So that it becomes the duty, the solemn obligation, of every man who believes in the maintenance of that faith, to stand unalterably committed to the principles and policies therein enunciated. It is with that great Constitution as a basis, a foundation, upon which the superstructure of our great country has been builded, and by reason of the operation of its principles our people have been able to attain to a position higher than which has been accorded to no other people on the face of the earth. Shall we now, after all these years of sacrifice and toil, refuse to be governed by the principles and policies of that great Constitution?

I say if it were possible under the present conditions to defend this man, I would be glad to do it. But to do that I must go back upon the Constitution established by the founders of this Republic, and in the language of the greatest orator that ever graced the hall of any legislative body, "May my right hand forget her cunning and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I ever falter in any degree in the support that I shall give to that Constitution of my fathers." [Applause.]

That he has violated the provisions of this Constitution I believe there is not a scintilla of doubt or question in the mind of any man who has been privileged to listen to the arguments presented here to-day. And I am persuaded, gentlemen, that it is the sentiment now of the great majority of the American people, who know the history of our glorious country—how the brave old fathers of the Revolution trod the thorny paths of adversity that they might leave to us, their children, as a heritage, a Nation free from the distressing incumbrances of oppression and tyranny; how Webster and Clay and Sumner and those renowned orators thundered that eloquence in defense of the Union and the Constitution that rendered their names immortal; and how in every great crisis with which our Nation has been confronted our people have bespoken their patriotism and loyalty by offering themselves a willing sacrifice upon the altar of its perpetuity—I say, I believe it to be the sentiment now, not only of this body but of the great majority of the American people, that, live or die, survive or perish, the integrity of this Nation shall be preserved and Old Glory shall be maintained, waving triumphant on the land and on the sea; that this Nation, founded upon the firm basis of liberty and equality—this Nation that loosed the bonds of royalty and crowned each private citizen a king; this Nation that rent the curtain of aristocracy and paved the way for the lowly to rise; that the grand old ship of this Nation shall continue to sail on, breasting heroically the tides of oppression and tyranny, of militaristic autocracy and Bolshevistic anarchy, until it shall finally drop anchor in the harbor of the highest possible attainments toward governmental perfection. And if it be the hope of the American Government that that shall finally be its destiny, this Congress, as well as all succeeding Congresses, must forever protect itself against the encroachment of any influence that has a tendency to destroy our great and glorious country. [Applause.]

The third section of the Constitution says:

> No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress who having previously taken an oath as a Member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a two-thirds vote of each House, remove such disability.

That section is as much a part of the Constitution to-day as it ever was, and is as effective as any other provisions of the great instrument. To say that that section, or any part of the Constitution, may be repealed by a simple act of Congress, as has been attempted by the contestee, is violative of its plain provisions and would rob the people of the very powers and privileges vouchsafed to them therein.

That Victor L. Berger is guilty of the violation of the provisions of said section is evidenced by the following extracts from the St. Louis platform, for which he assumes responsibility:

> The American people have been plunged into this war by the trickery and treachery of the ruling class of the country through its representatives in the national administration and National Congress.
> We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world.
> No greater dishonor has ever been forced upon a people than that which the capitalist class is forcing upon this Nation against its will.
> We recommend to the workers and pledge ourselves to the following course: Continuous, active, and public opposition to the war through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power.
> Unyielding opposition to all proposed legislation for military or industrial conscription. We pledge ourselves to oppose with all our strength any attempt to raise money for payment of war expense by taxing the necessaries of life or issuing bonds which will put the burden upon future generations.

These declarations of principles were uttered after the declaration of war, and millions of copies were distributed throughout the country during the progress of the war.

Victor L. Berger was a Member of the Sixty-third Congress, and as such made solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

I submit that his conduct and utterances are plainly in violation of the provisions of the Constitution, and therefore he is not entitled a seat in this Congress.

The time has come when the American people must stand foursquare upon the Constitution. That fundamental law this very hour is being assailed by an influence that finds its origin in the benighted, destructive minds of the Old World. America must awaken to the danger that confronts her now, and with that resolute determination, with that indomitable will, with that invincible fortitude, with that enthusiastic patriotism, with that unswerving loyalty, with that deep-seated conviction of right, and that great reverence for Almighty God that has characterized the people from the foundation of the Republic stand boldly forth in defense of the sentiment of the flag. Who is there now to villify the grand old standard? That glorious banner that has been the inspiration of our people in every great crisis in our marvelous history. And I call you to witness, that wherever its benign folds are unfurled to the breeze there the schoolhouses begin to spring up in the midst of the forest, there the church bell's sublime chimes begin to break the monotony of the eventide, there the hum of the wheels of industry, the glad song of the laborer, and the joyous shouts of the children are wafted on the morning zephyrs and the grand diapason of civilization is heard to peal above the discordant notes of heathendom, and all down the years of our glorious history not only has it been an inspiration to patriotic devotion in times of war, but hailed by all loyal Americans as an inspiration to the patriotism of peace. Let us now consecrate ourselves anew to the principles that have made our country great, and thus insure to the generations yet unborn the same blessings and privileges that were vouchsafed to us through the sacrifices of our fathers. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 14 minutes.

Mr. DALLINGER. I wish to yield at this time three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote to seat Mr. Berger as a Member of this House, and I desire to give my reasons for that course. The question that occurs to me is whether I am justified in excluding a man from membership here because he holds political or economic views which are not generally accepted here.

I am not a Socialist. There are many doctrines of socialism that I can not agree to, although I am satisfied in my own mind that the predominating parties, Democratic and Republican, have in the past stolen thunder from the Socialists. I am sorry to say that there is a great deal of misunderstanding, even among Members of Congress, as to what socialism is. Some people can not distinguish between socialism, syndicalism, and anarchism. I do not understand that the Socialists wish to overturn our form of government; I understand that what they are trying to accomplish is to bring about a more equitable and scientific method for the production and distribution of the necessaries of life and other products produced by the toil of men. No thinking man will deny that this is the one great overshadowing problem, not only before the American people but before the world. Our productive capacity has increased by leaps and bounds, thanks to the invention of machinery and the discoveries of science. There is abundant production, but the distribution of the producer's product is faulty; we find that in many cases the man who toils unceasingly goes without the comforts of life and is dependent on charity in his declining years, and we find others who do not toil and do not spin rolling in wealth and living on the toil of others. It does not take a man with large vision to see that this condition of affairs is not permanent. The unrest in the country today is eloquent evidence of the efforts of the toiling masses to gain economic rights. Just as the feudal system and slavery have given way to a greater political and economic freedom, as hand production has given way to machine production, so will the present system give way to one which will give more nearly to every man the product of his toil. The Socialist believes that this can be accomplished by doing away with the private ownership of productive capital. He says that this private ownership enables the owner of the capital, or means of production, to appropriate a part of the labor of others, and he therefore insists that this capital become state or community property, for the benefit of all. Personally, I fear that this solution is not practicable, because it will tend to take away the element of incentive in production, invention, and discovery. However, I have the greatest respect for a man who is a sincere Socialist. He has a pure and holy aim—to improve the mental and economic condition of his fellow men. To express feeling against a man because he is a Socialist is about as foolish as to revile him on account of his religious belief.

The Socialist believes in the economic interpretation of history, and I confess that I agree with him. He believes that the changes which have taken place in the world have been almost wholly the result of economic causes. He believes that war is the result of the operation of economic forces; and here again I must agree with him. The European war, like 99 per cent of all other wars, was caused by the economic rivalry of nations and lust for conquest incident to that rivalry. If any one doubts this, a study of the secret treaties of the Allies and the imperialistic peace treaty drawn at Paris, which deals almost wholly with lands, chattels, and dollars, ought to convince him. I have never believed that this was a war to make the world safe for democracy. If it was, it was a total failure, because I fail to see where the cause of democracy has gained anything. President Wilson, speaking at St. Louis on September 5, 1919, said:

> Is there any man here or any woman—let me say, is there any child—who does not know that the seed of the war in the modern world is industrial and commercial rivalry? This war was a commercial and industrial war. It was not a political war. * * * The real reason that the war that we have just finished took place was that Germany was afraid that her commercial rivals were going to get the better of her; and the reason why some nations went into the war against Germany was that they thought that Germany would get the commercial advantage of them.

Many men have been sent to prison in this country for saying about the same thing. If the President has the right to say it—and, of course, he has—the humblest citizen has the same right.

The Socialist, who seeks to do away with privately owned productive capital, and who believes that wars are the result of capitalistic conflicts, naturally is opposed to war. A man can not be a Socialist and believe in any except a defensive war. As I understand it, this has been the position of Victor Berger for 40 years, and it does seem to me that this fact must be given great consideration when we now judge him. I am satisfied that Victor Berger would take the same stand, no matter what country he might live in.

Mr. Speaker, I am the only one who will speak in behalf of Mr. Berger, and perhaps the only one who will vote for him. It would be easier for me, and doubtless more expedient for me, to vote with the majority, but I prefer to stand alone rather than to be a coward to my conscience. There is involved here a question of the greatest possible importance, and I will not yield my conviction. That question is whether, under the constitutional guaranty of free speech, Mr. Berger had the right to speak his conscience during the war without being punished for it. The Constitution of the United States provides that—

> Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press—

And also that the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land. That means to me exactly what it says, and that provision means the same to me in war as it does in peace. The greatest single blessing enjoyed by the people of these United States is the right of conscience—the right to think, and to say and write what one thinks. I admit of no limitation of that right, and no compromise of it, so far as expression of opinion is concerned. There can be no other rule for me. I believe, with John Stuart Mill, that—

> If all mankind, minus one, were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would be no more justified in silencing that one person than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind. Were an opinion a personal possession of no value except to the owner; if to be obstructed in the enjoyment of it were simply a private injury, it would make some difference whether the injury was inflicted only on a few persons or on many. But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth; if wrong, they lose what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth, produced by its collision with error.

There seems to be a popular impression that it is unlawful to express an opinion in regard to the war, and I am sorry to say there is ground for that impression when we consider that many men are now in prison who in fact have done nothing more than to express their opinions. Here is what the Supreme Court of the United States said on that subject in the famous Milligan case:

> This Nation, as experience has proved, can not always remain at peace and has no right to expect that it will always have wise and humane rulers, sincerely attached to the principles of the Constitution. Wicked men, ambitious of power, with hatred of liberty and contempt of law, may fill the place once occupied by Washington and Lincoln; and if this right is conceded, and the calamities of war again befall us, the dangers to human liberty are frightful to contemplate. If our fathers had failed to provide for just such a contingency, they would have been false to the trust reposed in them. They knew—the history of the world told them—the nation they were founding, be its existence short or long, would be involved in war; how often or how long continued, human foresight could not tell; and that unlimited power, wherever lodged at such a time, was especially hazardous to freemen. For this and other equally weighty reasons they secured the inheritance they had fought to maintain, by incorporating in a written constitution the safeguards which time had proved were essential to its preservation. Not one of these safeguards can the President, or Congress, or the judiciary disturb, except the one concerning the writ of habeas corpus.
> Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors; for even these provisions, expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than 70 years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men (founders of the Constitution) foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril, unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

I concede to no man or set of men the right to set limitations on the conscience of the individual. History has shown that it is exceedingly dangerous, and that men can not be trusted with that power. If I had my way I should amend the Constitution once more and state specifically and in detail wherein the right of conscience and the expression of that conscience consists. When I think of the men now in prison for the sake of conscience there passes before my mind's eye in review a long procession of martyrs. I see Socrates condemned to death after a judicial trial because he entertained opinions other than those of his accusers. Of course, he was not condemned on the charge of having opinions, but his accusers claimed that his doctrines contaminated youth. We now consider him the fountainhead of philosophy. I see Christ on the cross—a martyr to his opinions. I see John Huss burning at the stake, and Luther fleeing for his life. I see the witches burning in New England, and now I see Victor Berger and his codefendants sentenced at Chicago by a prejudiced judge to 20 years in prison—100 years for the five. This is practically a life sentence for each of these men. The American people are not going to stand for this. The excitement of war is rapidly disappearing and very soon the feeling of fairness and justice of the people is going to demand the release of these men, and all others who are suffering for the sake of conscience.

It is claimed that Mr. Berger did more than to express his opinions; that he was guilty of acts which interfered with the prosecution of the war. I have looked in vain to find a single instance where he advoctaed a violation of law or violated the law himself.

Mr. Berger has said in his editorials time and again that he does not believe in so-called direct action; that is, violence to accomplish a purpose. He has stated specifically, time and again, that the Socialists must gain their end through the ballot box. My recollection is that after the passage of the draft act, much as he disliked and denounced it, he advocated obedience to it. In the recent convention of Socialists in Chicago Mr. Berger was violently denounced because he refused to join the so-called communists and direct actionists. So far as I can see, he has vigorously denounced the war, and worked for an early and democratic peace, the right to do which I must concede him. In former periods of the country's history great men have bitterly attacked wars, but I have seen nowhere a claim that they had violated any law, or were guilty of any crime. Is it possible that the Constitution has changed its meaning?

Lincoln said during the Mexican War:

At its beginning, Gen. Scott was by this same President driven into disfavor, if not disgrace, for intimating that peace could not be conquered in less than three or four months. But now, at the end of 20 months, this same President gives a long message, without showing us that as to the end he himself has even an imaginary conception. As I have said, he knows not where he is. He is a bewildered, confounded, and miserably perplexed man. God grant he may be able to show there is not something about his conscience more painful than his mental perplexity.

Daniel Webster said during the Mexican War:

We are, in my opinion, in a most unnecessary and therefore a most unjustifiable war. I hope we are nearing the close of it. I attend carefully and anxiously to every rumor and every breeze that brings to us any report that the effusion of blood, caused, in my judgment, by a rash and unjustifiable proceeding on the part of the Government, may cease.

Now, sir, the law of nations instructs us that there are wars of pretext. The history of the world proves that there have been, and we are not now without proof that there are, wars waged on pretexts; that is, on pretenses, where the cause assigned is not the true cause. That I believe on my conscience is the true character of the war now waged against Mexico. I believe it to be a war of pretext; a war in which the true motive is not distinctly avowed, but in which pretenses, afterthoughts, evasions, and other methods are employed to put a case before the community which is not the true case.

Sir, men there are whom we see, and whom we hear speak of the duty of extending our free institutions over the whole world if possible. We owe it to benevolence, they think, to confer the blessings we enjoy on every other people. But while I trust that liberty and free civil institutions, as we have experienced them, may ultimately spread over the globe, I am by no means sure that all people are fit for them; nor am I desirous of imposing, or forcing, our peculiar forms upon any nation that does not wish to embrace them.

Theodore Parker, the great preacher, said during the Mexican War:

But why talk forever? What shall we do? In regard to this present war, we can refuse to take any part in it; we can encourage others to do the same; we can aid men, if need be, who suffer because they refuse. * * *

We can hold public meetings in favor of peace in which what is wrong shall be exposed and condemned. It is proof of our cowardice that this has not been done before now. We can show in what the infamy of a nation consists; in what its real glory.

Here is what Lord Chatham said in the English Parliament of our Revolutionary War:

I would sell my shirt off my back to assist in proper measures, properly and wisely conducted, but I would not part with a single shilling to the present ministers. Their plans are founded in destruction and disgrace. It is, my Lords, a ruinous and destructive war; it is full of danger; it teems with disgrace and must end in ruin * * *. If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country I never would lay down my arms! Never! Never! Never!

Lloyd-George said during the Boer War:

Why do I object to war? It is because, as a Liberal, I hate and abhor all war, and because I know of nothing that arrests progress like war. I have come to the conclusion that I would be a recreant before God and man if at this first opportunity I did not enter a protest against what I consider to be an infamy, and here I do it to-night, even if I leave Carmarten to-morrow without a friend. (Edward's Life of David Lloyd-George, vol. 3, p. 193.)

In October, 1901, Lloyd-George, in a speech charged that the English Army had burned villages, blown up farmhouses, swept away the cattle, burned thousands of tons of grain, destroyed all agricultural implements, all the mills, the irrigation works, and left the territory a blackened, devastated wilderness. Then the women and children were herded, in winter, in thin, leaky tents, surrounded by barbed-wire fences, where thousands died of unnecessary privations. He said:

Is there any ground for the reproach flung at us by the civilized world that, having failed to crush the men, we have now taken to killing babes?

Much has been said about the St. Louis platform. I wish to make myself clear on this point. Personally I do not approve it, but it is not a question with me of whether I approve what some one else says. The question with me is whether I am willing to concede to the other man the right to express his opinion. Since when is it the law in this country that one can not express his opinion in opposition to war? We must allow to the smallest minority in this country, if it be but one-tenth of 1 per cent of the population, the right to express its opinion on any subject.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. I can not yield. I have only three minutes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. No; I can not yield; I have only three minutes. I decline to yield to anyone.

I believe that Victor Berger was railroaded to prison at Chicago. He did not have any show whatever, and it was an outrage to try him at the time he was tried. I have no sympathy with the persecution of such men as Victor Berger and Eugene V. Debs.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. VOIGT. I say those men should be immediately released.

Mr. BLANTON. I rise to a question of the highest privilege of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit to the Speaker that it is improper in exercising the privileges of debate on the floor of this House for a Member to denounce the laws or the Government of the United States and the operations of this Government in the prosecution of war against an enemy, and that is what the gentleman is doing here now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the gentleman is out of order. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. VOIGT. I am in favor of releasing all men who have been imprisoned during the war for the sake of their consciences. The Government should immediately release these men. It has been done in all European countries, and we should lose no time in following suit.

I believe that Judge Landis was prejudiced against Mr. Berger. Mr. Berger presented an affidavit of prejudice to Judge Landis. Under the law as I understand it, Judge Landis had the power to decide whether he was prejudiced or not. He decided that he was not. I take it that he had the power to call in another judge. I consider it exceedingly bad form for a judge to pass on the question of whether he is prejudiced. If I were a judge, and either party should intimate to me that there was some doubt about my fairness, even if I felt absolutely that I had not the slightest prejudice, I should decline to try the case. The sentence imposed on these men is outrageous—more evidence to me of the judge's state of mind. I can not go into this matter at length, but I have formed my opinion from reading the hearings.

It appears in the hearings (p. 830) that after the conviction of Berger and his associates one of the men who served on the jury, named Nixon, swore that one of the bailiffs or deputies, having charge of the jury, sought to influence the jury against Berger. Nixon swore that the bailiff kept up his attack on Berger in the presence of the jury; that the bailiff said, "This man Berger, the son of ———, ought to be taken out and hung. He is a damned Dutchman." The bailiff asked Nixon if he had read the life of Benedict Arnold. He said "No." Then, the bailiff told him where he could get it. The statements made by the bailiff were put down in a diary which Nixon was in the habit of keeping. I see no reason why this juror should perjure himself, and believe he told the truth. Henry Cochems, Mr. Berger's attorney (p. 830, hearings), says of this:

Surely, if there is a living God that looks over this, he told the truth, and I appealed to Judge Landis, and told him that the record could be made so that he never could be reviewed by the court of appeals, and I said, "This is the truth. I do not care what you say, and every man in this court room knows it." It was the truth, the solemn truth, as though a man were leaning over his mother's grave. The record was made up and that was rejected. It was accepted as the truth by the court. I will bet my life against a toothpick that it was the solemn truth, and yet these men are headed for Leavenworth upon a verdict of that kind.

If the jurors were influenced in this way, and I have no doubt they were, a new trial should have been granted. Berger, on the appeal, was required to furnish $100,000 or $125,000 in bail—another evidence of prejudice. The Constitution provides that excessive bail shall not be required.

I desire to pay a well-earned compliment to Henry Cochems, the attorney for Mr. Berger before the committee. He surely made his client's cause his own. His brief filed with the committee is the greatest I have ever seen. It shows a wonderful grasp of principles and is a mine of information on the questions involved.

Mr. DALLINGER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KLECZKA.]

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is another Member of this House who will subscribe to the views expressed by the gentleman who has just preceded me [Mr. VOIGT]. [Applause.]

It is a significant coincidence that at the very hour that Berger stood upon the floor of this House heaping abuse upon organized government and constituted authority, hurling defiance at all law and order, and reviling the espionage act, the Supreme Court of the United States was announcing decisions in two cases—the Abrams and Stilson cases—upholding the constitutionality of the espionage law and approving long-term sentences for the printing and circulation of articles and proclamations that were less vicious and outrageous than the seditious and treasonable utterances and writings of Victor Berger. [Applause.]

Berger will discover before long that the laws of the land can not be outraged and violated with impunity, and that free speech does not mean license to preach sedition and treason. When the propaganda of the enemy conducted in this country by Boy-Ed, Von Papen, Zimmermann, and Bernstorff was exposed and ultimately crushed, Berger embarked upon a course of activity that was far more nefarious and harmful than that of the secret agents of the Imperial German Government. The spies of Germany did their work in a subterranean and secret manner, but Berger improved upon their tactics by spreading the poison of sedition openly and brazenly.

The espionage law was necessary for the very reason that we harbored in our midst men of the Berger type. We protected our soldiers by providing them with masks against the enemy's poisonous gases that would destroy their bodies, and we were compelled to protect them against the poisonous gases of sedition, hurled by insidious enemies at home, who tried their utmost to kill their souls and spirit.

Mr. Speaker, the evidence in this case is so overwhelming and so convincing that no unbiased or unprejudiced mind can come to any other conclusion except that Berger, by his written and spoken words and pernicious activity, has given aid and comfort to the enemies of our country. Born in Austria, he came to this country at the age of 18 to escape, as he admitted before the committee, the oppressive burdens of Hapsburg autocracy and militarism. He realized full well the splendid advantages and privileges and possibilities which this country afforded and which he would enjoy. All the opportunities which American citizenship affords were his. He was elected to the office of alderman in the city of Milwaukee and elected to Congress. Few men who came here from foreign shores enjoyed the blessings of a democracy in fuller measure than Mr. Berger, and yet, when the life of this land of equality and opportunity was challenged and threatened, when the very existence of the institutions which have done so much for him was trembling in the balance of the World War, he repaid this country with the blackest ingratitude and basest treachery. When the die was cast and war was declared, when there was no other course for loyal Americans to pursue but to support unflinchingly America and her forces in the prosecution of the war, what was his attitude and conduct? He immediately set out upon a course of bold opposition, determined in every way to embarrass this country, interfere with the resolute determination of the American people, and in every conceivable way endeavored to impede its war preparations and thereby give assistance to the enemy.

War was declared on April 6, 1917, and on the following day the Socialist Party held an emergency national convention in the city of St. Louis, at which they promulgated the party's "proclamation and war program." Mr. Berger was instrumental in drafting that proclamation and war program and approved the sentiments therein expressed by attaching his signature to that document. He never renounced that infamous declaration, but, on the contrary, now arrogantly boasts that he has lived up to the program.

In the history of this country there never was uttered a more contemptible, infamous, and treasonable proclamation. It declared, among other things, that—

> The American people did not want and do not want this war. They have not been consulted about the war and have had no part in declaring war. They have been plunged into this war by the trickery and treachery of the ruling class of the country, through its representatives in the national administration and National Congress, its demagogic agitators, its subsidized press, and other servile instruments of public expression.

We know that the war was inevitable. Congress by an overwhelming majority voted to declare war. But Berger charges those Members of Congress who voted for the war declaration with trickery and treachery and brands them as men bereft of honor and conscience. We appreciate the courage and undiluted patriotism of those who, responding to the dictates of their conscience and the voice of the American people, voted to declare war. They were militant Americans, every one of them, true to their oath of office and zealous for the Republic's preservation. But Berger indicts them as the servile and corrupt agents of the capitalists. That is Berger's estimate of the integrity of this House, to whose membership he now pleads to be admitted.

The socialist war declaration, which Berger helped to promulgate, declared:

> We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world.

If the declaration of war was a crime, then those who voted for the declaration of war participated in a crime and are crinfinals. If the declaration of war was a crime, then those who responded thereto were criminals. Berger defiantly admits that he indorses that declaration to-day; that he does not retract it in the least; that those are still his sentiments to-day.

It staggers one's power of belief that a man who has witnessed the events of the Great War, who has heard of the incomparable heroism and sacrifice of the American fighting forces, who knows of the unparalleled services of American manhood and womanhood, is so permeated with treachery and sedition that with brazen impudence he continues to outrage the feelings and sentiments of the American people. Yes, more, he desecrates the sublime sacrifices of our heroes. He scoffs at the wounded and crippled soldier. He carries his sacrilegious pollution so far as to brand the martyrs in the cause of civilization and humanity, who sleep in the fields of France and Flanders, as "criminals." Where is the individual whose conscience is so deadened and whose heart so corroded who will not shudder at such profanity and sacrilege?

Berger said that "in all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage." We fought to preserve the Republic, but in Berger's opinion that was unjustifiable. We fought in defense of the most sacred and inalienable rights and privileges of freemen, but to him that was most unjustifiable. We fought to destroy the most conscienceless, cruel, and unrelenting form of despotic and tyrannical militarism that the world has ever known, but Berger says that was unjustifiable.

In his "proclamation and war program" Berger said "no greater dishonor has ever been forced upon a people than that which the capitalist class is forcing upon this Nation against its will." America entered the World War in defense of the rights of humanity and the cause of democracy against the most unrelenting foe, but Berger claims that was dishonorable. We entered the struggle in order that the power of right might prevail over the forces of might, but in Berger's opinion that constituted dishonor. We entered the war in order that millions of bondsmen might be freed from the galling fetters of autocracy and restored free and unshackled to the bosom of humfanity, but Berger says that was dishonorable.

To rise and fight and die for the privileges and birthrights of mankind, to fight for the freedom of the downtrodden and oppressed people of Europe, to fight for the emancipation of all the peoples from the mailed fist of the Kaiser, were, to the Berger mind, a dishonor.

It is superfluous to specify further. It was unjustifiable and dishonorable, in Berger's view, to declare war in defense of all these rights, privileges, and principles, because his one thought, hope, and wish was to see this temple of democracy, these glorious United States of America, destroyed and become a dominion subject to William Hohenzollern and his dynasty. He opposed America because he subscribed to the Kaiser's declaration enunciated in Poland before the war that "Prussianism, like the spirit of imperial Rome, must expand and impose itself."

Berger recommended "continuous, active, and public opposition to the war through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power," and Berger throughout the entire trying period of the war carried on his opposition to the war with all the means at his command and to the limit of his power.

To absolve himself from the consequences of his treacherous conduct, he offered before the committee the sickening defense that the fine record of the State of Wisconsin and the city of Milwaukee disproves that his seditious propaganda and anti-American activities were productive of detrimental results. He now makes a dastardly attempt to shield himself with Milwaukee's splendid war record. Milwaukee has gone "over the top" in every drive. [Applause.] She has oversubscribed her allotted quota in every Liberty-loan campaign. The famous Thirty-second Division, designated by Gen. Mangin as "Les Terribles," which won praise and admiration for heroic achievement in battle, contained many National Guard units composed of Milwaukee volunteers. [Applause.] No matter what the call of duty, no matter what the sacrifice, Milwaukee responded in a most generous measure and in a manner that evoked the commendation of the people outside her borders.

But Wisconsin's and Milwaukee's splendid war record was the product of the unselfish, patriotic, and heroic endeavors of her loyal citizens. Berger made every attempt to stifle the patriotic efforts of these citizens, but the overwhelming majority of the people of Milwaukee were immune to the poisonous gases of Berger's propaganda. They refused to follow this apostle and exponent of "Kultur," and their attachment and devotion to America and her cause were but intensified by the obstructive, demoralizing, and seditious tactics of Berger and his cohorts. Milwaukee's splendid war record, achieved in the face of, and in spite of, the organized opposition of Berger and his forces of disloyalty, is a glowing testimonial of the intense spirit of service and self-sacrifice of its loyal American citizens.

On the floor of this House Mr. Berger has the impudence to claim that he is "the true choice of the electorate of the fifth district in Wisconsin." This is in keeping with many of his other reckless and untruthful statements. Consistency and due regard for truth are virtues which are foreign in the intellectual make-up of this man. Through the systematic distribution to every home in his district of campaign pamphlets, which contained false statements regarding the war, and which appealed to the passions and prejudices of a certain portion of the people in his district, through the circulation of the Milwaukee Leader, of which he was editor, and which was the medium for disseminating his treacherous and treasonable propaganda, he succeeded in poisoning the minds of many unthinking people in his district. That was the meat on which this political adventurer fed. He now claims that because he obtained a plurality of the votes in a three-cornered contest he is the "true representative of his district." The loyal American citizens of his district have repudiated him in no unmistakable language. He can not claim to represent any but perhaps the unthinking and misguided voters who were misled by his subtle, poisonous, and lying propaganda.

Loyal Americans who were members of the Socialist Party could not remain members of the Bergerized party after it had promulgated the treasonable war program. They repudiated the St. Louis anti-American declaration, withdrew from the party, and performed their duty as American citizens in a crucial period of this Nation's life. Among these loyal and right-thinking citizens were some of the leading men of Milwaukee, men who held high places in the councils of the Socialist Party and men who were elected to positions of responsibility and trust in the municipal and State governments. They knew what socialism means and what the doctrines of internationalism are. They refused to remain members of an organization that pledged itself to interfere with America's holy purpose in this war, and forsook this organization when it was delivered body and soul by Berger and his satellites to the enemies of America. They renounced Berger and his disciples and patriotically fulfilled the obligations of their American citizenship and supported this country in the prosecution of the war whole-heartedly and in a manner that evoked the most generous commendation.

Berger not only attempted to embarrass the Government and paralyze all war activities, but he advocates doctrines that are inimical to organized and representative government. He worships at the shrine of the international destroyers of law and order. In his testimony before the committee he refers to Lenin, whom he met at the sessions of the International Socialist Bureau in Brussels, as a man of "excellent education" and as "absolutely sincere." The world is appalled at the havoc, destruction, desolation, and disorder prevailing in Russia today. The sympathies of the civilized people go out to the unhappy people of that country. Berger, however, certifies that all the suffering and misery brought upon the unfortunate people of Russia through the reign of terror inaugurated by arch-Bolshevist Lenin is the product of "absolute sincerity." Surely if Berger approves of what is prevailing in Russia, Bolshevism, then, is but another name for Bergerism.

Several years ago Berger wrote an article which, among other things, contained the following:

> In order to be prepared for all emergencies, Socialists and workingmen should make it their duty to have rifles and the necessary rounds of ammunition at their homes and be prepared to back up their ballots with their bullets if necessary.

While appearing as a witness before the committee his attention was called to the aforesaid article, and he was asked whether he has changed his opinion on the use of violence, as advocated in that article. To this he frankly and coldly replied that he has not changed his opinion on this subject.

While testifying before the committee, he was asked whether he subscribed to the I. W. W. fund, and admitted that he made such a contribution. He was asked whether he knew that the I. W. W. were indicted for violations of the espionage act, and to this he replied that "that does not make any difference." His attitude toward this organization, which advocates the overthrow of organized government by violence, was revealed in a letter written by him on May 6, 1918, to a secretary of the Industrial Workers of the World. In this letter, among other things, Berger said:

> I am beginning to believe that the I. W. W. (or some labor organization that will succeed it but that will inherit its matchless spirit) is destined to take the place of the American Federation of Labor in our country and fulfill the mission in which the American Federation of Labor has failed.

In this letter Berger discloses his contempt for and hostility to the American Federation of Labor, which has accomplished so much in improving the conditions of the American laborer. He wishes to see this organization destroyed and supplanted by the I. W. W., who resort to the most revolting violence, as the occurrences of the recent past demonstrate. And he approves of their outrageous tactics and their revolutionary spirit as "matchless." This is the creed and sentiment of a man who, if admitted to the membership of this House, would be expected to support the Government in the maintenance of law and order.

The American workingman realizes that Berger is bent on destroying American institutions, which are the real bulwark against all forms of oppression. This self-anointed apostle of the proletariat is false to the cause of the laborer, as he has been false to his oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States and to the cause of the Republic. He is endeavoring to use the laborer solely for political exploitation. As showing his real love and zeal for the workingman, his testimony before the committee is very illuminating. Berger testified:

> I am at the head of a business; I do not own my business; but at the head of an institution which employs 153 people—printers, compositors, newspaper men, etc. It is a socialist concern and pays good wages; often above the union scale; and yet there is not a single man employed there because the publishing company loves him. The paper will only employ him because the institution thinks it can make good use of him. He is employed not because he needs employment but because the institution needs him.

Berger also testified before the committee that "the workingmen as a rule have not brains enough to understand their class interest." Because the American workingmen refuse to accept his doctrines, this egotistic high priest of the forces of destruction heaps abuse upon them and contemptuously says, "They have not brains enough." Berger is convinced that with the abdication of the late Kaiser he is the only surviving superman still at large competent to destroy all that civilization holds dear.

Mr. Speaker, to admit this man to membership in this House would be to outrage the patriotic instincts of every American and to break faith with those who, responding to the call of America, have fought and bled and died in order that the blessings of democracy might be preserved and perpetuated to us and all succeeding generations. Clearly and emphatically the Constitution of the United States provides that—

> No person shall be a Representative in Congress who, having previously taken an oath as a Member of Congress to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof.

The evidence that Victor Berger gave aid and comfort to the enemy is overwhelming, and our constitutional duty to exclude him is plain and unescapable. [Applause.]

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to my colleague on the committee, Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina.

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, whatever difference may have been at one time expressed in this House as to whether loyalty was a qualification for membership in the American Congress, it has been now settled by abundant authority that loyalty is one of the qualifications for membership. [Applause.] And that proposition was well expressed by a distinguished former Member of the House, then chairman of the Elections Committee, Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, who, in his report in the case of John Young Brown, said:

It was inherently implied in every constitutional provision under which the House had its existence that no man should be qualified to sit as a Member who had not the indispensable qualification of loyalty to our Government.

[Applause.]

The laws of human society authorize the Government to resort to all means to preserve itself.

That is the law governing this House in the consideration of the great and weighty question that confronts us now. It would be deplorable and painful enough if one who had never had a seat in this House had been guilty of the acts charged and proved against Victor L. Berger and which in fact are conceded by him to have been committed. But, it is all the more deplorable, and all the more painful to realize, that one born on the other side of the Atlantic who emigrated to this country to seek and avail himself of the great opportunities that the Republic affords, who was elevated to membership in this House of Representatives, who stood in this very place confronting the Speaker, and while facing the American flag, held up his hands and solemnly vowed that he would support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, should in the dark hours of America's greatest trial, when the very life of the Republic was at stake, stab the Nation in its back and be guilty of acts which constitute sedition and rebellion. [Applause.]

The Constitution we have all sworn to support by its terms under the fourteenth amendment obliges us to exclude Berger from membership in this House. [Applause.]

What does the Constitution provide? That, if one having previously taken an oath as a Member of Congress or as an officer of the United States or as a member of any State legislature to support the Constitution of the United States shall have engaged either in insurrection or rebellion against the same or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, he should be disqualified for entrance again into the American Congress unless Congress by a vote of two-thirds of each House remove such disability.

That is the substance of the constitutional mandate. Shall we observe it now? Shall we overlook the seditious acts and the rebellious utterances made during the time when our boys went to the front to face the enemy, when every loyal citizen of the Republic was anxiously praying for the success of our arms, or shall we uphold the dignity of the House and refuse membership of one who employed every means at his command to give aid and comfort to the enemy? [Applause.]

We are not concerned with utterances made or views expressed by Berger before our country's entrance into the war. They play no part in the determination of the question we are called upon to decide. The Elections Committee have plainly stated this through their chairman and in their report. We are, however, deeply concerned about what Victor Berger did after the Congress had declared war and we were cast in the midst of armed conflict. The Socialist platform adopted at St. Louis after America had entered the war, reaffirmed at Chicago in August of 1918, was the one advocated by Berger. In every conceivable form of language that platform called upon the people to withhold their support of every governmental agency used for the successful prosecution of the war. While you and I and all good people of the country were making efforts to promote the sale of Liberty bonds and war savings stamps Berger was counseling the people to refuse such aid to the Government. While our soldiers and sailors were across the seas and making heroic efforts to overcome the enemy, making the highest sacrifices man can make for country and for flag, Berger was denouncing the war as a crime against the people of the United States, promulgated the false statement that the war declaration was an act of dishonor, and counseled opposition to the laws that had been constitutionally enacted.

The distinguished chairman of the Elections Committee [Mr. DALLINGER] in his speech to-day alluded to a letter written to me during the days of the war by that great American, whose memory shall ever be cherished and revered, Theodore Roosevelt. On page 72 of the committee hearings the letter will be found. It testifies the judgment of that great patriot as to the conduct of the men who during the war days preached the sentiments and reiterated the unpatriotic pledges embodied in that platform. I might have refrained now from the use of the letter, but the use of it by the committee and allusion to it to-day by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts relieves me of any delicacy I might otherwise feel from presenting to this House the complete letter of the late President Roosevelt, as part of the quoted portions of the platform was omitted from the print in the committee record. The letter, which stamps the acts of men who counseled unyielding opposition and vigorous resistance to the Government during the war as moral treason, reads:

THE KANSAS CITY STAR,
OFFICE OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
New York Office, 347 Madison Avenue, October 16, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. GOLDFOGLE: I am exceedingly glad that the Republicans have indorsed your nomination for Congress in the twelfth New York congressional district. The national Socialist Party platform adopted at St. Louis in 1917—after we had entered the war—and reaffirmed at Chicago in August last, contains the following planks:

"We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world.

"In all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage.

"No greater dishonor has ever been forced upon a people than that which the capitalist class is forcing upon this Nation against its will.

"We pledge ourselves: To continuous, active, and public opposition to the war through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power; to unyielding opposition to all proposed legislation for military or industrial conscription and to continuous efforts to repeal such laws; to opposing with all our strength any attempt to raise money for payment of war expenses by taxing the necessaries of life or issuing bonds which will put the burden on future generations."

All this is at least moral treason to the United States.

Mr. London by his actions in Congress has shown his agreement with the platform as enunciated. Under these circumstances I fail to see how any upright and honest citizen or any patriotic American can vote for him. The Germanized Socialists of America have made themselves the tools of the German militaristic and capitalistic autocracy. Mr. London's votes show that he has a right to the support of the Germanized Socialists. He has no right to the support of patriotic American voters. You are standing on a platform of 100 per cent Americanism, and by your actions you have shown that your devotion to this platform is genuine and sincere. I very earnestly wish you success in your contest.

Faithfully, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

HON. HENRY M. GOLDFOGLE,
New York City.

No better authority could possibly be furnished from the pen of any man as to what the Socialist platform, adopted after the war, meant than came from the words of that great patriot whose Americanism furnishes enduring lessons to us and to generations to come, and whose memory is enshrined in the hearts of our countrymen, Theodore Roosevelt.

The utterance of that great American statesman, Senator Sumner, in the elections case of Philip F. Thomas in the Fortieth Congress are most applicable to the case with which we are dealing now. Speaking of acts of sedition of Thomas, who sought entrance to the Senate, Senator Sumner said:

A Senator failing in loyalty is a present enemy, whose presence in this council Chamber would be a certain peril to the Republic. It is vain to say that loyalty is not declared to be a qualification. Loyalty is made a qualification in the amendment to the Constitution, and then again in the original text when in the most solemn way possible it is distinguished and guarded by an oath.

* * * * * * *

But no man can be allowed to take the oath as Senator when, on the evidence before the Senate, he is not competent. If it appears that he is not of sufficient age, or of the required citizenship or inhabitancy, he can not be allowed to go to that desk. Especially if it appears that he fails in the all-important qualification of loyalty he can not be allowed to go to that desk. A false oath taken with our knowledge would compromise the Senate. We who consent will become parties to the falsehood. We shall be parties in the offense. It is futile to say that the oath is one of purgation only, and that it is for him who takes it to determine on his conscience if he can take it. The Senate can not forget the evidence; nor can its responsibility in the case be swallowed up in any process of individual purgation. On the evidence we must act and judge accordingly.

All the stronger is the logic for the exclusion of Berger. He frankly avows that he does not and will not recant a word from what he declared during the war. Instead of recognizing, as all good citizens do, that the laws of the land must be observed and obeyed and the will of the majority must govern, Berger insists that he and a minority of the people could and would exercise their own judgment as to whether they should or should not obey the constituted authorities of the land and stand by the Government in the hour of its peril.

He who in hours of war, constitutionally declared, advocates resistance to our laws, counsels men and women to withhold support of the legitimate agencies of Government essential to gain supremacy over the foe, and is willing that the men and boys of our Army and Navy be deprived of help so that, starving and helpless, they may be forced to succumb and leave our flag to go down to defeat can not be fit to take the constitutional oath and hold high place in the Nation's council.

I speak as an American, whose first concern must be the safety of our country, the security and welfare of our people, the honor and dignity of our Nation, and the perpetuity of American institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, ever since I took the oath of office I have always voted on the side of loyalty, and I propose to-day, in keeping with my pledge and obligation, to vote to keep Mr. Berger from coming in here and becoming a Member of this House. [Applause.]

This is a Government of majorities, not minorities. If a majority of the people of this country wanted socialism or Bolshevism, under our Constitution and laws, they could have it; but until they do that it is the duty of this Congress to stand by the Government as it is now constituted.

If I did not vote to unseat Mr. Berger, I would be going back upon my previous record for loyalty. I would have to stultify myself if I voted otherwise than to unseat him. Of all the times in the history of this country now is the time to stand by the country and to teach true Americanism, and we can do it no better than to remove Mr. Berger from membership in this House or prevent him from becoming a Member.

I believe in upholding the law at all times, and I believe in teaching respect for law and order at all times and under all circumstances.

I believe that labor and capital both have a right to organize, and in that opinion I am supported by some of the best people in the country.

I believe labor not only has a right to organize but that they have a right to collectively bargain, just as capital has a right to organize and collectively bargain, and this right should not be interfered with.

Labor has a right to strike just as capital has the right to refuse to give employment to labor if it chooses. These rights have never been questioned up to this time by thinking men.

The trouble has been that at times the Government has leaned too much toward capital and at other times too much toward labor.

If the laws were fearlessly administered at all times and under all circumstances, and if each was given his just dues at all times, there never would be any complaint, but when the Government at one time favors a certain class against another class, then the trouble begins.

I believe in law and order at all times and under all circumstances, for if any of the laws we enact are unjust there is ample opportunity to correct the evil under our system of making law, but while the law lasts and is on the statute books it should be lived up to by all.

At times the Government has placed hardships upon capital and at other times upon labor. It has been said "right wrongs no man," and that is true.

If capital and labor both knew that there was to be no favoritism, we would have less trouble in this country and less agitation.

We are going to be compelled to do it in the future, and the sooner the better for us all.

The trouble seems to come from the fact that some one at some time disobeys the law and gets by, and that encourages others to disobey the law.

If the minute capital tried to crush labor it would be stopped by the strong arm of the Government, and if no special advantages were given certain classes, there would be less complaint.

If it were known that the minute lawlessness began it would be suppressed, there would be no lawlessness.

This bad feeling between labor and capital comes from the fact that each feels that certain advantages have been given the other by the Government.

In one community, for instance, no attempt is made to suppress lawlessness, while in another the laborer is treated as if he were an outlaw.

First do away with this discrimination and enforce the law impartially and you will have solved the problem.

This discrimination confuses and makes for lawlessness. Remove the cause by treating both capital and labor justly all the time and peace will come. Not transient peace, but permanent peace.

Encourage both capital and labor to respect the law by treating them both fairly at all times.

Let justice be done. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MONAHAN].

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, shall Victor L. Berger be given the seat in the House to which he was elected in 1918 or shall he, because of his own words and deeds, be denied the right to sit as a Member in this Congress? Stripped of all legal verbiage that is really the issue before the House.

No question is raised by the Government concerning the regularity of his election nor of the correctness of the election returns, and Berger practically admits the acts and deeds charged against him by the United States, but holds they were in no sense treasonable and that he was strictly within his rights in saying and doing what he did; that the Constitution and laws of the United States gave him that unqualified right.

Victor L. Berger is a living example of that old saying, "A leopard can not change his spots nor the Ethiopian his skin," and of the further fact that we are largely the creatures of heredity and environment.

Sixty years ago he was born in autocratic Austria, where for 18 years, during the time when the heart was young and the mind plastic, he drank deeply from the poisoned waters of autocracy. But seeing no opportunity for himself to become an autocrat in the land of the Hapsburg he came to America, landing at Bridgeport, Conn., in 1878, and in 1881 he, to the everlasting misfortune of Wisconsin, made Milwaukee his home. He had found a way and a place to become an autocrat that gave promise of enabling him to wield a power undreamed of by king, prince, or potentate of ancient or modern times.

To appreciate fully the foregoing sentence, one must know Mr. Berger as we in Wisconsin know him. He is large, well proportioned, has ideal Teutonic features, a mentality above the average, and in many ways is a natural leader of men. Had these great gifts been used in safe and sane methods for the uplifting of the race, Berger would have lived in history as a great and good man, but never as an autocrat or one striving for autocracy.

But all these great qualities are lost in the immensity of his colossal egoism. The gibes leveled at the late Kaiser as being called "the all highest" and the senior member of the firm of "Me und Gott" would have in no sense been pleasing to Berger, who, had he possessed the power, would probably have dissolved the firm and hung out a new sign reading, "Me und Victor."

The foregoing is, I believe, a fair and honest description of the man as the world knows him.

Why did he leave the land of the Hapsburg and Hohenzollern to come to this country, this Republic within a democracy, to live beneath the protecting folds of that flag which Washington and his soldiers had carried to victory, a flag that never waved on a battle line but that it was carried by soldiers who fought and died that men might be free?

He came to a land where no hereditary titles exist, where there is absolute separation of church and state, where all men are equal before the law, with a constitutional right of a trial by a jury of his peers. He came of his own free will and accord, and became a citizen of this country. Why did he come? The cause may be found in a dozen reasons, but I believe the principal one was this:

A German by the name of Karl Marx, the real father of modern socialism or communism, in one of his pamphlets entitled "The Manifesto of the Communists," on pages 28 and 29, says:

> The communists assist everywhere every revolutionary movement against existing social and political conditions.
> In all these movements they endeavor to point out the question of property, no matter what degree of development it may have obtained, as the leading question in the movement.
> The communists finally labor for the union and association of the revolutionary parties of all countries.
> The communists disdain to conceal their opinions and ends. They openly declare that these ends can only be reached by the forcible overthrow of all existing social arrangements.
> Let the ruling classes tremble in view of the impending communist revolution. The working classes have nothing to lose but their chains. They have a world to win!
> Workingmen of all countries, unite!

Berger early in life became a Marxian disciple, and continued to be until his ego told him he was a far wiser, much greater man than Marx ever was. When he discovered that Marx was only a man, while he was a really-truly superman, he sought for a land as boundless in resources as his own ego was measureless and all prevailing.

Hence, he came to America, took the oath of allegiance to this Government, swore fealty to the flag and support to the Constitution, and, having done this, adopted the red flag of socialism, communism, anarchy, the I. W. W., and Bolshevism, and began the spreading of a propaganda which he hoped would ultimately lead to the undermining of the Constitution, the destruction of the Government, the breaking down of all commercial and social laws and customs, the tearing down of Old Glory from her place in the skies, and the raising of the red flag in its stead.

All students of history know that socialism and all attending schools of political economy invariably lead to autocracy, and thus Berger intended to become an autocrat who could sit in his office and by pushing a button call a strike in certain industries (as has been done recently in the coal fields) unless their demands were immediately complied with.

Here Berger and his codestructionists met with an unlooked-for obstruction. They found the task much more difficult than they anticipated. They found that the Civil War was ended and the country rapidly recovering from its horrors and devastation. They found the men behind the industrial guns were largely made up of soldiers of the late war, and whether they wore the blue or the gray each carried a loyal American heart, whether he had been born here or across the sea.

So strong was Americanism in those days that Bergerism was a foul weed of slow growth.

Then the soldier began to grow old with increasing years. The foreigner, who had grown up in the blighting atmosphere of autocracy, came to this country in ever increasing numbers and gradually took the jobs formerly held by the Americans.

They could not speak our language, neither did they understand our institutions. They were ofttimes despondent and homesick, and too often fell an easy prey to the propaganda of the Bergers, who, like hookworms, worked in the dark to weaken and destroy this Government.

These people were not naturally vicious, but they were ignorant of our laws, language, and customs, and blindly followed when and where the Bergers led. For how could they reason when they did not know? They, at the beginning, did not mean to be vicious, cruel, or bloodthirsty, but—

> Vice is a monster of so frightful mein
> As to be hated needs but to be seen.
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

Many of the socialists never intended to become anarchists, nor the anarchists I. W. W.'s nor Bolshevists, and Mr. Berger in his latest pamphlet, which reached my desk on Saturday, says in effect that there are differences and distinctions in the aims, objects, and methods of these various camps, and that they have in fact no common grounds of union, yet it is also in the record of the trial that when an I. W. W. was indicted for crime Berger sent him $10 to aid in his defense and addressed him as "My dear comrade."

The innocent socialist, having in view only the betterment of his material conditions, away from the land of his birth, unable to read or speak our language, falls an easy prey to the harpings of these ravens of discontent. Beautiful Eutopian dreams are painted for them. The harshness of their physical conditions is magnified and harped upon, until they honestly believe that they have a grievance, whether it be true or not. When they reach this condition of mind it is easy to lead them from socialism to anarchy and to I. W. W.'ism and finally to Bolshevism.

I appeal to the honest socialists of the Nation to study well your condition and position and see if this is not true and if the teachings of your autocratic teachers and bosses are not as false as their doctrines are foul.

I call your attention to the fact that although you have been floating down the stream, going you know not where, but going, ever moving on and on, that the current is moving faster and faster; that the boat, which seemed so safe and comfortable at the start, is beginning to rock and careen; that whereas while formerly you merely floated along you now dash along, and away in the distance you hear the sound of maddened waters.

I urge you to stop, look, listen, and think. Then seize your oars and pull for the shore as rapidly as possible, for I tell you that the sound you hear comes from the rapids of anarchy and I. W. W.'ism. The rapids are below you, and in those rapids are elements of destruction to your craft and death to you and yours.

Listen again and you will hear farther away, but coming with deadly menace, the deep, hoarse roar of the mighty falls of Bolshevism, a sound that can be heard from Russia to every point on the civilized globe to-day.

The transition has been easy. First, from socialism—the wet nurse of anarchy—then to anarchy, then to I. W. W.'ism, then to Bolshevism, which means the destruction of all civilization, all laws, all liberties, with the establishment of an autocracy, headed by the Bergers of these various movements, and all bound together by an underlying, overlapping, intertwining system of signals and sympathies, with the trail of the serpent of destruction over all.

Let me plead with you here and now to get away from these false ideas and false teachings. Get back to the teachings of Washington and the founders of the Constitution and become in heart what you really profess to be—American citizens, standing for American ideals.

The laws, customs, and usages that are in force to-day are not here by accident. They are an evolution of all the best the past has given us—a survival of the fittest—the sole hope of the race. Whenever these laws and customs become obsolete, caused by changing conditions and higher ideals, let such laws be changed or modified to meet present conditions, but make those changes by peaceful and constitutional methods and not attempt it by using the bullet, the assassin's dagger, the torch, or the bomb.

Mr. Speaker, we to-day stand at the parting of the ways. One road leads to the land of justice, hope, constitutional law, progress, and enlightenment; the other to the fetid slough of dishonor, where, fed by the foul streams of autocracy, treason, and disloyalty, the reign of Bolshevism becomes a horrible reality, where civilization will be crucified and human hopes destroyed. Are we going to stand for Americanism or Bergerism?

You can not serve two masters. You can not be for the Stars and Stripes, which represents the greatest democracy on the globe, and for the red flag of the Bergers. "Ye can not serve God and mammon," says Holy Writ.

Prove all things and hold fast that which is good, but first make sure of your proof. Be sure you are right, then go ahead, but first be sure that you are right. Build your civic institutions skyward, but first see that the foundations are secure.

Let your aims and ambitions rise beyond the stars, but keep your feet on the ground, ever remembering that "what a man soweth, that shall he also reap"; and if you continue to sow under false leadership the doctrine of class hatred, hell, and hypocrisy it will surely lead you into the whirlpool of desolation and the pitfalls of death and destruction to our civilization so earnestly advocated by the Bergers of the Nation.

Victor L. Berger once occupied a seat in this House as a Member of Congress from Milwaukee. Before taking his seat he raised his right hand and took a solemn oath to support the laws and Constitution of this country. Yet when the hour came and the existence of this Nation and the liberties of the world were at stake he wretchedly failed in every test of loyalty to the country of his adoption.

War against Germany was declared on April 6, 1917, and on the following day he and his fellow conspirators issued, in behalf of the Socialist Party and the Hun supporters who resided within our gates, a declaration which that sterling American, Theodore Roosevelt, denounced as treasonable, which was so pro-Hun in its assertions that loyal Socialists were driven out of the Socialist Party that they might remain loyal Americans.

The fact that some of his coworkers marched through the streets of a city in this Nation following the red flag and carrying red banners upon which were printed the words "No flag, no country, no God," brought no word of protest from him.

He opposed enlistments; he opposed conscriptions; he opposed, wherever and whenever he could with safety, the buying of Liberty bonds, and all efforts of the Government to carry on the war.

His paper, the Milwaukee Leader, was so virulent in its attacks upon the Government that the Postmaster General took away from him the right of using the United States mails, and finally he was indicted under the espionage act, tried for treason in the city of Chicago by a jury of his peers, found guilty, and sentenced by Judge Landis to 20 years in the Federal penitentiary, and has several other indictments for these or similar offenses now pending against him. Yet, in the face of all this, he comes to this Congress, glorifying in his past record, offering no apologies for his past misdeeds, and asks to be seated as a Member of this House, the greatest lawmaking body of the Nation, to take the same oath which he took eight years ago, only to violate, and to become an active lawmaker for the Nation which for years he has sought to destroy.

Since the convening of this Congress he went to New York and in a public address delivered in that city said in substance:

> I have carried the red flag to the doors of the penitentiary. When I let it fall, then you young men must raise it aloft and carry it forward.

The proper place for Berger is a cell in the Federal penitentiary—not a seat in Congress. Neither have I any patience or sympathy with these anemic patriots who prattle about: "Now that the war is over, all war prisoners should be released." Why? Are they not just as guilty now as the day they were convicted? Were not their offenses of the blackest of crimes? Were they not rounded up and convicted by our Government at great expense and at an hour when all the man power of the Nation was needed to save the civilization of the globe?

A man steals a horse and is arrested; after several days the horse is found and returned to the owner. Would any of you advocate that, now the horse has been recovered, the thief should be given his liberty? Not one of you. When a man commits as heinous a crime as treason to his country the spirit of the law says, "He shall be punished."

I warn you to beware of that class of men who referred to love of country as "capitalism," loyalty as "dollar hunting," spelled patriotism "(pay)triotism," and God with a lower-case "g," for they are unclean.

It was this class of men—and they were not all Germans—to whom the Kaiser referred when he shook his finger in the face of James W. Gerard, the American ambassador to Germany, and said, "I'll stand no nonsense from America when this war is over, for I have a million men in America now who will protect Germany's interests." And it was this same bunch of treason incubators that Gerard had in mind when he shook his fist in the Kaiser's face and said, "Yes; and over in America we have a million lamp-posts upon which to hang them."

Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, I weigh my words well, and I say to you now and here that it would be no more unpatriotic or un-American to put the ex-Kaiser in the White House, Von Hindenburg in charge of our armies, and Von Tirpitz in command of our navies at an hour when we were at war with Germany than it would be to vote to give Victor L. Berger a seat in this House. I say this in intense earnestness, for I am speaking in behalf of the intensely earnest and patriotic people in Wisconsin.

The loyal people of Wisconsin have done vicarious atonement for Berger and Bergerism since the beginning of the war. Believe me, it was in no sense pleasant to travel in any of our sister States and have the statement constantly thrown in your face that Wisconsin was a traitor State, and all this continued until practically the close of the war, notwithstanding the fact that Wisconsin grandly met every condition and performed every task asked by the General Government. Her National Guard was of the first volunteers sent across the seas. Her young men registered for the draft, and when selected went to the front singing, "Keep the home fires burning." There were but few attempts to evade the draft or desert from the country, and those who did are tagged and branded for life. [Applause.]

Wisconsin went "over the top" in all the bond drives and other war activities, and did it so promptly, so enthusiastically, that it surprised the misinformed people of other States. [Applause.]

The retreat of the 10,000 Greeks described by Xenophon, whose bravery in battle and wisdom around the council fires is one of the heroic epochs of history, was no greater than that performed by the loyal Wisconsin people at the beginning of and continuing through the war.

Only recently Wisconsin, by a vote of more than 3 to 1, voted $15,000,000 in bonds for the relief and aid of her discharged soldiers, and all this with but little or no aid from the Bergers, and ofttimes despite their hookworm opposition. [Applause.]

Wisconsin is to-day eagerly awaiting the result of our deliberations on the question now before the House. Shall we by our vote send a message to the heroic men of the Badger State who assisted in making this wonderful record; to the mothers who gave their boys for human liberty, that liberty might live; to that innumerable army of Red Cross workers and trained nurses who suffered and worked, and with tearful eyes, on bended knees, prayed to God while our Armies fought; and to our invincible soldiers, who maintained the highest traditions of American Armies in the past, a message of appreciation for their valor and soldierly deeds which aided in crushing the Hun and rolling back the waves of gray seeking world dominion, and who to-night will stand in groups with uncovered heads and say, "God bless the House of Representatives! Our comrades who made the supreme sacrifice have not died in vain"?

Or shall we say by our vote, "Now that the war is ended, give this traitor to our country a seat among America's most loyal and patriotic"?

If the former, it will mean that Old Glory will continue to wave o'er the land, beloved, honored, and respected.

If the latter, that Berger's red flag, which to him is greater and dearer than the Stars and Stripes, shall become not only the emblem of this country and perhaps the world, but that the civilization of the ages will be lost in chaos and ruin.

The foregoing is the only issue in this case. Mr. Berger pretends to believe that he is to be kept out of Congress because he is a Socialist. This is the sheerest nonsense. Mr. Berger was not kept out of Congress before when he was elected, nor has any Socialist been denied a seat because of his political belief. It is not because he is a Socialist but because he, as an individual, working through the Socialist Party, in which organization he held a commanding position, was recognized as one of the leaders, and as such proved disloyal to his country in time of war. That is the reason.

He says on page 14 of his pamphlet, "I am sure to be reelected if Carney is not seated." It is not to make this Congress "safe," as Berger says, that objection to his being seated is made, but to keep it American. It can not be that the people of the fifth congressional district of Wisconsin will ever again elect Berger to any office; but if they do, now that he stands convicted by a jury, sentenced by a judge, and his case thoroughly gone into by a committee of this Congress, it will only show that a majority of the voters of the fifth congressional district are just as disloyal as Berger himself. That is unbelievable.

But if they should send Berger back he will come bearing the same burden of disloyalty and treason that he does to-day, and in my opinion no Congress would ever seat him, for while he might be the choice of the fifth congressional district of Wisconsin and that district sends him back I believe that the Members of this House will reach out their hands to the struggling loyalists of that district and say: "If you are unable to clean house within we will assist you by giving your district a dry cleaning from without."

During the World War German armies for months thundered at the gates of Verdun, which lead to the heart of France. From the French ranks a cry went out. It was one of defiance. It breathed the spirit of France.

That cry was, "They shall not pass," and from the army to the people of the nation that cry flew from lip to lip, and "They shall not pass" became the watchword of the nation. [Applause.]

The Germans made shambles of their armies. The valleys run red with their blood. Wave upon wave in lines of gray again and again dashed against the French line only to be hurled back in slaughter and rout, and above all the noise of conflict could be heard and seen the spirit of France, waving back her shout of defiance: "They shall not pass," and they did not. The Hun was held. His lines were broken. His assaults failed. Verdun remained under the flag of France. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, to-day the powers of evil, the emissaries of darkness, the foes of constitutional law and the civilization of the Nazarene, are knocking at the door of the House of Representatives, demanding admission for their representative, Victor L. Berger. Let us answer that challenge my hurling back the answer of heroic France at Verdun, and say to him, "You shall not pass." [Applause.]

Let us here to-day figuratively engrave those words over the door, so that the Bergers of to-day, to-morrow, a hundred or a thousand years hence, when they with traitorous hands knock at that door demanding admission, will be met with that sign, ablaze with patriotic justice: "You shall not pass. You shall not pass." [Great applause.]

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I shall make no apology for voting to deny Victor L. Berger a seat in this House. [Applause.]

In the Sixty-fifth Congress, in the contest between the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Weaver, and Mr. Britt, I voted to seat Mr. Weaver, a Democrat, and unseat Mr. Britt, because I believed Mr. Weaver had been lawfully elected. In the same Congress, in the contest between the gentleman from Alaska, Mr. Wickersham, and Mr. Sulzer, I voted to seat Mr. Wickersham, a Republican, because I thought he had been legally elected. In this Congress I recently voted to unseat the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Fitzgerald, a Democrat, because I did not think he had been lawfully elected. To-day I shall vote to exclude Victor L. Berger, a Socialist, from membership in this body, not because of his socialism, for that has nothing to do with the case, but because it has been conclusively proved that he is not qualified to hold any office of profit or trust under this Government. It is perfectly clear that he was not only disloyal to this Nation during the World War but the record shows that he was guilty of treason against the United States throughout that momentous struggle. [Applause.]

There is no conflict in the evidence on this question, and, judging from the expressions of opinion that we have heard here during the course of this debate, there will not be more than one vote cast against the pending resolution.

On April 7, 1917, the Socialist Party, by the action of its emergency convention in St. Louis, divided itself into two branches. One branch, headed by Mr. John Spargo, an intensely loyal American, pursued a highly patriotic course throughout the war. That course was foreshadowed by the minority report rejected by the St. Louis convention. The following excerpt from this report is typical of the attitude of the Spargo branch:

> Now that the war is an accomplished fact, for the reasons stated, we hold that it is our socialist duty to make whatever sacrifices may be necessary to enable our Nation and its allies to win the war as speedily as possible.

To the principle thus enunciated practically every Socialist in the district which I have the honor to represent gave loyal adherence and undivided support. While the Socialists of my district were upholding our Government and ungrudgingly sending their boys to the front to fight for our cause, Victor L. Berger was promulgating the following doctrine:

We recommend to the workers and pledge ourselves to the following course of action: Continued activity and public opposition to the war through demonstration, mass petition, and all other means within our power * * *. We pledge ourselves to oppose with all our strength any attempt to raise money for payment of war expenses by taxing the necessaries of life or issuing bonds which will put the burden upon future generations.

The man who is now asking for a seat in this House preached that treasonable doctrine and printed it and sent it broadcast throughout this Nation in an attempt to prevent this Government from winning the war, a war in which thousands of American soldiers were laying down their lives and hundreds of thousands were baring their breasts to the deadly charge of Prussian bayonets and facing the withering fire of German guns. If Berger had been successful in his vicious and treasonable efforts to prevent the sale of Liberty bonds, the result would have been ignominious defeat and inevitable starvation for every American soldier on the battle field.

Victor L. Berger has denounced our Government, dishonored our country, and despised our flag. He has been proved to be a traitor as dangerous and loathsome as was Benedict Arnold. He not only deserves to be excluded from this House; he deserves to be expelled from this country. He ought not to have been sent to Congress; he ought to have been sent to the penitentiary.

It is our duty to drive him from our midst, purge this Hall of his presence, and consign him—

To the vile dust from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

[Applause.]

Mr. EAGLE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to exclude Victor L. Berger from this House. [Applause.] He is un-American, he was guilty of disloyalty during the war, he consorted with Bolshevists and contributed money and comfort to the I. W. W., he was an enemy to the United States of America, he gave aid and comfort to the enemy, and was guilty of all kinds of deviltment against our Government. For that man to hold a seat in the American Congress among Congressmen who stand for our flag would be a reflection upon the American people. [Applause.]

While our boys were fighting and dying on foreign soil to overcome the enemy, which had determined to despoil our fair land and destroy our Government, Victor Berger was stabbing in the back every soldier enlisted in our country's cause. That speech he made on the floor of this House to-day is enough to condemn him before the bar of public opinion. His own speech proves that he was disloyal all during the war, and that right now he is an enemy to America.

No man who utters such sentiments is fit to be a Member of Congress. He calls the espionage law infamous. Congress passed that law to keep down such enemies within as Victor Berger. He defied the law, and as a result is to-day under a sentence of 20 years in the penitentiary. His audacity on this floor in his shockingly disloyal speech is an insult to all true Americans. May the Lord God of Hosts save us from such men as Berger.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE]. [Applause.]

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, after the speech we have just heard I do not really think anything can be added [laughter], because I think every man in the House will say in the language of the old preacher, "Them's my sentiments," even though they may not express them in his way. I wish to use this one minute to say that I am in favor of unseating Victor L. Berger, not because he was born in Austria, for we had thousands of them loyal, or because of Austrian descent, because we had thousands of them loyal to our flag, nor because he has been convicted by a jury, for I hold no man guilty until final judgment, neither am I going to unseat him because he is a Socialist, for we had thousands of them loyal, but because in the hour of our country's danger, when our flag and our liberty and our hearts were involved, he was untrue to our traditions; untrue to the boys who were fighting in France, and untrue to his country. [Applause.]

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, such other time as may yet be remaining to me I yield to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts now has five minutes remaining.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE].

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, we have listened this afternoon to some splendid, instructive addresses upon pure Americanism, and they reflect the overwhelming sentiment of this House and of the American people.

In keeping with this program I take this occasion as a Republican and, above all else, as an American to pay tribute to the Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General of the United States [applause], and to his able assistant, Judge Ames [applause], who successfully presented the Government's case at Indianapolis last Saturday.

Judge Ames very properly contended that—

There is no organization superior to the law; otherwise there is successful revolution.

That able and fearless Federal judge, Albert B. Anderson [applause], met the situation squarely by upholding the Government's position, sustaining the injunction and issuing a mandate to the strike leaders commanding them to issue a withdrawal and cancellation of the strike order. In rendering his decision, among other things, Judge Anderson said:

I assume that they (meaning the defendants) are law-abiding citizens and will obey the court; and if they don't, I will make them. The Government is supreme, even above labor. This strike is the most lawless thing I have ever seen in this country. If they can go on with it, it is rebellion.

The Government's position is correct and must be sustained unflinchingly by men intrusted with the conduct of public affairs. Attorney General Palmer is to be commended for his stubborn insistence in overcoming the objection of the Secretary of Labor.

If we are to accept the press reports, the Secretary of Labor stood side by side with Mr. Gompers, insisting in substance that, notwithstanding the unlawful conduct of these strike leaders, the strong arm of the law should not be exercised to restrain them.

Republicans and Democrats alike should unite in sustaining the Department of Justice, not only in its position toward the coal strike but in its efforts to round up the reds and radicals for deportation. It is a sad commentary upon our Government in the handling of this "red" menace to have a Department of Justice ever alert in detecting the anarchists and alien firebrands, who ought to be deported, and on the other hand a Department of Labor which is overly nice in deciding whether these culprits should be deported after being apprehended by the Department of Justice. I have in mind that last spring some 50 Bolshevists were gathered in at Seattle and sent to Ellis Island for deportation. The public never read a more encouraging item of news. The Department of Labor, a few days later, according to newspaper reports, paroled some 20 of these radicals, and they received an ovation at the New York I. W. W. headquarters.

The jurisdiction over deportation ought to be transferred from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice.

The American Federation of Labor, in its statement to-day pledging support to the strike leaders of the United Mine Workers of America, even to the extent of defying the Government and its courts, is guilty of a most outrageous assault upon the principles of American government. There is no longer any middle ground. We are confronted with this proposition: Is the American Federation of Labor more powerful than the Government itself? Can it successfully defy the law?

I am fully conscious that for Members of Congress to unflinchingly perform their duty to the public means in some cases banishment from public life. Personally I would rather a thousand times over be retired to private life conscious that I had tried to squarely meet the issue than to be returned to Congress and know that at a critical time in the Nation's history I had been a party to surrendering the public interests and welfare into the hands of any organization. The right will prevail; free government will survive. I have an abiding faith in the intelligence of the American people. Thank God, these leaders do not represent unorganized labor nor reflect its sentiment. They do not reflect the sentiment of the rank and file of even organized American labor. Thousands upon thousands of union laborers will recognize the fallacy of this leadership and will insist that their local unions renounce their obligation to the American Federation of Labor and proudly acclaim undivided allegiance to their country.

Through the courtesy of the House, there was inserted in the RECORD of Thursday, November 6, at page 8051, an open letter addressed to the striking miners of my district. Mr. William Stevenson, president of the Michigan branch, United Mine Workers of America, severely criticized this appeal, and on Saturday last I gave to the Michigan press representatives the following statement:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., November 8, 1919.

It is to be regretted that President Stevenson follows the arrogant leadership of John L. Lewis and others who have brought discredit upon his organization, and urges the men for selfish purposes to consider their obligation to organization as greater than their allegiance to the Government itself.

Without any expression from the miners, their leaders made demand for 60 per cent increase in wages, a six-hour day and five-day week, and authorized a strike effective November 1 without even seeking an adjustment of any kind with the operators or the Government. The ringleaders of this strike rejected the President's request for arbitration as a means of settlement and refused to defer the strike.

Mr. Stevenson's reply is no answer to my appeal. It is irrelevant for him to say that I voted to bring Chinese labor into this country during the war, and he is mistaken. His suggestion that my appeal be directed to the Michigan mine operators is best answered by his own statement that he intends to stand by the United Mine Workers of America until this national organization wins the strike. The Michigan operators might offer to increase the wages 100 per cent, and pass the additional cost of coal on to the consumer with even additional profit. It would be an outrage upon the consuming public, yet the Michigan miners under present leadership could not even accept such a proposal, as it would not receive the assent of the United Mine Workers of America.

It is my duty to serve the public welfare above either the employer or employee. My sympathy, however, is always with the person who toils. If ever there was a time which required a cessation of strikes, idleness, and loafing and an earnest application to real work, it is now. The cost of living to many people is becoming almost unbearable. The problem can never be solved by simply increasing wages, decreasing hours and workdays, thereby increasing the cost of production and again increasing the cost of living, requiring further increase in wage. Everyone everywhere must get back to work until supply comes nearer meeting the demand, and in that way only will we successfully meet the situation.

My letter emphasized only the Government's position. This is an unusual situation which, if allowed to remain unchecked, will necessarily result in a national calamity. The controversy does not question the right to quit work or to even strike for a lawful purpose. It questions the conspiracy and concerted arrangement by which the strike leaders intend to paralyze transportation and industry and impose cold and hunger upon the people of the Nation. The action of these strike leaders presents a situation which challenges the supremacy of the law. I would be unfit to represent my people if I could not appreciate the seriousness of this situation, and I would be too cowardly to merit their confidence and respect if I refrain, in a crisis like this, from expressing my thought.

GILBERT A. CURRIE,
Member of Congress, Tenth District, Michigan.

Now, gentlemen of the House, I will not take more of your time, but will ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by commenting upon the action of the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor and also incorporating in the RECORD a statement given out by myself upon this strike situation last Saturday. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I understand I have two minutes remaining?

The SPEAKER. Two minutes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Well, in the first part of that, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that all the Members of this House, on both sides, who have spoken upon this matter, be given five legislative days to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman make it three legislative days, and make his request to include all Members of the House?

Mr. DALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may be given the privilege to extend their remarks upon this subject for three legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all Members may be given three legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this subject. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Being their own remarks?

The SPEAKER. Their own remarks.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, in the time remaining I want to refer to the fact that this man, Victor L. Berger, both at the hearings and in outside publications, has talked a good deal about the right of free speech and about Abraham Lincoln, intimating that, if alive, he would uphold his (Berger's) position. I have in my hand a copy of volume 8 of the Works of Abraham Lincoln, by Nicolay and Hay, in which is a letter written by that great man to Erastus Corning, dated June 12, 1863, in which occurs this wonderful paragraph, which may well serve as a fitting climax to this debate:

Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier boy who deserts, while I must not touch a hair of a wily agitator who induces him to desert? This is none the less injurious when effected by getting a father, or brother, or friend into a public meeting, and there working upon his feelings till he is persuaded to write the soldier boy that he is fighting in a bad cause, for a wicked administration of a contemptible government, too weak to arrest and punish him if he shall desert. I think that, in such a case, to silence the agitator and save the boy is not only constitutional, but withal a great mercy.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired, and under the unanimous-consent agreement the previous question is ordered on the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances of this case Victor L. Berger is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the fifth congressional district of the State of Wisconsin, or to hold a seat therein as such Representative.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 311, nays 1, not voting 119, as follows:

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. HUDDLESTON.

Mr. RODENBERG with Mr. EVANS of Montana.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of my colleague, Mr. NICHOLS, who is unavoidably absent in New York with the congressional committee meeting the first contingent of our deceased soldiers, I desire, at his request, to announce that if he were able to be present to-day he would have voted in favor of this resolution.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I have been asked by my colleague, Mr. TREADWAY, to state that if he were here he would vote in the affirmative.

CONTESTED ELECTION—CARNEY AGAINST BERGER.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 1, I call up the contested-election case of Carney against Berger, and move the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Joseph P. Carney, not having received a plurality of the votes cast for Representative in this House from the fifth congressional district of Wisconsin, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

Resolved, That the Speaker be directed to notify the governor of Wisconsin that a vacancy exists in the representation in this House from the fifth congressional district of Wisconsin.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, Is it usual for Congress to pass a resolution notifying the governor?

Mr. DALLINGER. In reply to the gentleman I will say that the committee has followed the precedent in Smith against Brown, in the Fortieth Congress.

I will explain to the gentleman from Tennessee that in this case there was a curious complication. House resolution No. 6, relating to the question of the eligibility of Victor L. Berger, which was adopted by the House on the first day of the present session, was referred to a special committee of nine members. At the time that special committee was appointed the Speaker intended to do what was done in the Roberts case, namely, to appoint the members of the Committee on Elections No. 1 as the special committee, but the Democratic members of the committee had not been determined upon at that time, and the Speaker appointed the three ranking members of the Committee on Elections No. 1 of the last Congress as the Democratic members of the special committee, thinking naturally that they would also be members of the Committee on Elections No. 1 of the present Congress. But it seems that the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, who act as the Democratic committee on committees, did not put the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY] on the Committee on Elections No. 1, although he had been appointed by the Speaker as a member of the special committee.

So we have this complication: House resolution No. 6 was referred to the special committee of nine members, while the contested-election case of Carney against Berger, which came into the House in the ordinary way, the testimony having been taken under the statute before a notary public, was referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1, of which Mr. WELTY was not a member. That necessitated two separate reports—one by the special committee, which has been before the House to-day, recommending the resolution declaring Mr. Berger ineligible, which has been adopted; and the other by the Committee on Elections No. 1 on the contested-election case of Carney against Berger, recommending resolutions declaring Joseph P. Carney not entitled to the seat, and directing the Speaker to notify the governor of Wisconsin that a vacancy exists.

Now, I have called up the contested-election case of Carney against Berger, in regard to which I understand there is no difference of opinion. The committee is unanimous, and, as is pointed out in the report, the congressional precedents are all against the proposition which is contended for by the contestant, Mr. Carney, although there are precedents in the English Parliament to sustain it, namely, that the candidate having the next highest number of votes is entitled to the election in the event of the candidate having the highest number of votes being declared ineligible.

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, I am not raising that question, of course. The committee have very correctly reported as to that, but the question with me is whether it is customary for the Congress to send a notification to the governor of the State that a vacancy exists.

Mr. DALLINGER. I understand that the Speaker has always done that. I know that such is the custom in the Massachusetts Legislature. At any rate, this resolution, as I have said before, follows the form of the resolution in the case of Smith against Brown in the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. RUCKER. I should like about three or four minutes on this matter.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield to me about three minutes?

Mr. DALLINGER. I yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. I am not really going to talk on this matter. I hope I have not misled anybody.

The SPEAKER. The debate is supposed to be confined to the resolution.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I am going to make some observations on the action of the House on the motion to exclude from the RECORD the speech of Mr. Berger. If I can not talk about it now I will talk about it later, because I have a few things I want to say. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have permission. I want to say that this to me is a very remarkable performance. By unanimous vote, with one exception, this House has determined that by reason of the unpatriotic character and conduct of a gentleman who was elected to Congress from the fifth district in Wisconsin he is not entitled to a seat on this floor—that he is unworthy of occupying a seat here. The fact is that here to-day, in the presence of the Speaker and in the hearing of the membership of this great legislative assembly, he has reiterated, repeated in effect, and boldly and defiantly refused to retract, qualify, or apologize for the disloyal and unpatriotic utterances for which he at this very hour stands convicted in the courts of our country.

He audaciously denounced the President, abused and vilified the judiciary of this Nation, ridiculed, jeered, and laughed at you Members of Congress, arraigned you for lack of backbone and manly courage, and yet when the motion was made to exclude from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD his foul and slanderous assaults upon the President, who lies upon his sick bed; his unwarranted assaults upon the Attorney General, who is to-day in a stalwart way performing a great and valuable service to the American people [applause], and his wanton and malicious attacks upon the membership of this House; you gentlemen, following, I may say, the lead of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and of my distinguished friend the ex-Speaker of the House [Mr. CLARK], deliberately voted permission to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the same infamous language and slanderous and criminal accusations against our Government for which he has been found guilty by a jury of his peers and adjudged a felon by those who tried him. So to-morrow morning, after having expended the public funds of this Nation to put into type and to provide the paper upon which to print his foul calumnies and foul assertions against the administration and against law and order, we will compensate the railroads for carrying to the utmost parts of this Republic the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, containing these untrue, unjust, unpatriotic, un-American ravings of one who would destroy our system of government.

Let me ask you, What will the American people think of you, my Republican friends, and of a few of you, my Democratic friends, for voting to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD these anathemas, these accusations against our Federal administration; these protests against law and order, and this, too, at a time when the foundations of this mighty Republic are being shaken by reason of just such men as Mr. Berger, who are allowed to run at large? [Applause.]

Oh, you voted to expel him. Yes; you have denied him the privilege of taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution which he would willingly destroy. Let me say that back in your districts and in mine the verdict of patriotic men has been written, and the people demanded of you, as they demanded of me, that we purge the House of Representatives of the presence of a man so unpatriotic, so absolutely opposed to the flag and the institutions of our country as to be guilty of the treasonable utterances which a few Democratic Members and most of the Republican Members have just voted to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The people will not indorse this action. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by request of the gentleman from Kentucky, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who is indisposed, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have leave to sit for a few days in the hearing of a case before it.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next we dispense with the proceedings under paragraph 7, Rule XXIV, for Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that business on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10208. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the city of Decatur, Ala.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1373. An act to amend the Articles of War.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 383.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 10453, being an act to provide for the termination of Federal control of the railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and other provisions"; that said bill shall be the continuing order until its consideration is concluded, subject only to conference reports and privileged matters on the Speaker's table; that the House shall meet at 10 a. m. on Tuesday, the 11th day of November, and each succeeding day thereafter during the consideration of the bill, and shall take a recess on Tuesday, the 11th day of November, at 6 p. m. until 8 p. m.; that the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with; that the general debate shall continue until 12 o'clock noon on Wednesday, November 12, and be confined to the bill, and the time shall be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]; whereupon the bill shall be read for amendments under the five-minute rule; that at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendments the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, with such amendments, if any, as may have been agreed to; thereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for the consideration of the railroad bill. It is thought by the Committee on Rules that they have complied with practically the unanimous request of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in bringing in a rule providing for the consideration of the bill beginning at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning and continuing to meet at that hour each day until the consideration of the bill has been concluded.

It is the desire of everyone to give this bill the consideration that its importance entitles it to. The rule is unanimously reported by the members of the Committee on Rules, and so far as I am concerned I shall take no further time.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I shall take but very little of that five minutes. The action of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is unanimous and the action of the Committee on Rules is unanimous. Notwithstanding this rule, consideration of this bill is going to take a considerable part of the remaining 18 days before the regular session begins. There are just 18 days, that is, workdays, remaining before the regular session in December commences, and it seems to me that the time has about arrived to quit talking about adjourning and taking a recess. With the condition of the country at this time, it seems to me that the patriotic duty of every Member is to stay on the job until December and quit talking about adjournment. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2472, to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, with House amendments thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, insist upon the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2472, the amendment to the Federal reserve act, recently passed, with House amendments thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] just a moment ago to impugn the motives of Members of the House who voted against striking out the remarks made by Mr. Berger.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that while a conference report is pending.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But I am asking unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Two requests for unanimous consent can not be pending at the same time. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. PLATT, Mr. MCFADDEN, Mr. DALE, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. WINGO.

SALE OF MACHINE TOOLS TO EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, and other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up a conference report on the bill H. R. 3143 and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to sell at 15 per cent of their cost to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, and other recognized educational institutions, upon application in writing, such machine tools as are suitable for their use which are now owned by the United States of America and are under the control of the War Department and are not needed for Government purposes. The money realized from the sale may be used by the Secretary of War to defray expenses, except cost of transportation, incident to distribution of the tools, and the balance shall be turned in to the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That in the event any such material is offered for sale by said institutions without the consent in writing of the Secretary of War, title thereto shall revert to the United States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JULIUS KAHN,
CHAS. POPE CALDWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. W. WADSWORTH,
HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The House receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate with changes, the effect of which are as follows: The House bill fixed the price at which the machine tools could be sold at 10 per cent of their cost; the Senate fixed the price at 20 per cent. Your conferees finally agreed to the rate of 15 per cent of their cost, and the Senate conferees agreed to the same. The Senate provided that the money realized from the sale of machine tools may be used by the Secretary of War to defray the expenses incident to the distribution of the tools, except the cost of transportation, and that the balance shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts. The House conferees agreed to the change.

Otherwise the bill is practically in the form and language that it left the House.

JULIUS KAHN,
CHAS. POPE CALDWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I realize that it is getting pretty late, and I am not sure——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to rise to a question of personal privilege?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I rise to submit a parliamentary question in which the question of personal privilege is involved. As I understood the remark of the gentleman from Missouri—I do not desire to take up the time of the House now—but if I correctly understood the gentleman from Missouri in his statement it was to the effect that those who voted against striking out the remarks made by Mr. Berger perhaps did not reflect the condition of their own hearts when they voted not to seat Mr. Berger, but were reflecting the judgment of the people back home. Now, I have the highest regard and respect for my friend, and I may have misunderstood him——

The SPEAKER. The Chair listened to the remarks by the gentleman from Missouri, and the Chair does not think they reflected upon Members of the House or raises the question of privilege.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Speaker on his clearness of hearing and accuracy of his judgment, and I am surprised at my friend, who is always so clear, both in conception and in expression, of misunderstanding me in that way. I made no such statement; at least I thought not.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. RUCKER. But I did say this: I did bring some question as to the judgment employed by those who voted to table the resolution, not as to the motive, because I had in mind that my distinguished friend, for whom I have great respect, voted wrong himself.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I withdraw the inquiry.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution from the Committee on Rules which has just been adopted immediately resolved the House into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union automatically. Now, all these matters that have come since have been out of order. The rule does not interfere with conference reports after the House has gone into Committee of the Whole House and risen again, but the rule when adopted puts the House into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union at once.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sent for the rule, as it is not here.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is unquestionably the rule as agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the House must either adjourn or resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARRETT. It must first go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will take the chair.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Could I get unanimous consent to extend my remarks?

The SPEAKER. It will not be in order on the point made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman withhold that point?

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10453, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the House will meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock to take up the consideration of the bill. Therefore I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10453 and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman withhold that one moment?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, what remarks? The remarks the gentleman recently submitted?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

Mr. RUCKER. I will put the remarks in just as I said them, with emphasis. The gentleman need not be so captious.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 9093) for additional compensation to the soldiers, sailors, and marines.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. SEARS (at the request of Mr. CLARK of Florida), on account of the death of a close friend.

To Mr. JACOWAY, indefinitely, on account of illness of his mother.

To Mr. WOODYARD, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, November 11, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, concerning acquisition of fishing rights in Pearl Harbor, Territory of Hawaii (H. Doc. No. 295); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Labor, transmitting a statement of the travel performed during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1919, by officers and employees of the Department of Labor (other than those who in the discharge of their regular duties are required to constantly travel) on official business from Washington, D. C., to points outside of the District of Columbia (H. Doc. No. 296); to the Committee on Labor and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 456), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 379) authorizing the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to sit during sessions of Congress and during recesses to examine witnesses, etc., reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 459), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3212) for the relief of legal representatives of George E. Payne, deceased, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 460), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. VESTAL: A bill (H. R. 10462) to promote the safety of employees and passengers on railroads engaged in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HULL of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 10477) to create in the Army of the United States a corps to be known as the Corps of Chaplains; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RICKETTS: A bill (H. R. 10478) granting additional compensation to the officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, including nurses (female); to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ZIHLMAN: A bill (H. R. 10479) to provide increased compensation for employees of the government of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Resolution (H. Res. 381) requesting the Secretary of War to review the settlement of certain claims arising out of war contracts; to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Resolution (H. Res. 382) providing for certain employees and the payment of the expenses of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. TINKHAM: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 37) fixing November 11 as industrial armistice day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 10463) granting an increase of pension to Homer Schrock; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 10464) granting an increase of pension to William N. Bridges; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURROUGHS: A bill (H. R. 10465) granting an increase of pension to Roy W. Turner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 10466) granting a pension to Martha J. McCleary; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 10467) granting an increase of pension to Francis Tolson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KING: A bill (H. R. 10468) granting an increase of pension to Wesley Priest; to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

EMBARGO ON DYES AND COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Finance. I report back from that committee favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) to continue the control of imports of dyes and coal-tar products. It will not lead to any debate and it is agreed to in the House. They want to have it there that they may pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That notwithstanding the prior termination of the present war the provisions of the trading-with-the-enemy act approved October 6, 1917, and of any proclamation of the President issued in pursuance thereof which prohibit or control the importation into the United States of dyes or other products derived directly or indirectly from coal tar are continued until January 15, 1920. During the period between the passage of this joint resolution and January 15, 1920, neither the President nor the War Trade Board section of the Department of State, nor any other agency of the Government, shall issue to any person, corporation, partnership, or association any license or permit to import into the United States any such dyes or coal-tar products, and during such period no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall import into the United States dyes or coal-tar products except by virtue of a license or permit heretofore issued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution just read?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There was so much noise I could not hear it fully. Will the Senator state what the joint resolution proposes?

Mr. PENROSE. Briefly, it is a joint resolution which has been agreed on by the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House, after consultation with the manufacturers of dyestuffs and the consumers, chiefly the textile manufacturers, practically to maintain the present embargo on the importation of dyestuffs until January 15, 1920, and to afford an opportunity to consider a proper protective bill. It is feared that with the consummation of peace the American market will be flooded with German dyestuffs within a week or 10 days and that it will be ruined for years to come. Representative LONGWORTH, the author of the bill pending in the Senate, has agreed to this joint resolution, as has everyone else concerned.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it a unanimous report of the Finance Committee?

Mr. PENROSE. No, sir; I candidly admit that such was the urgency of the legislation I had to canvass the committee and I have not even seen all the members of it; but so confident am I that the joint resolution is unobjectionable that I have taken the chance. It is very necessary to have the joint resolution passed and sent to the House right away, because that body may take a recess or an adjournment at the end of the week, and if it does so without acting on this joint resolution the result will be very serious.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think for the present I shall object. It may be that later in the day we can arrange for its consideration, but I should like to examine it.

Mr. PENROSE. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

WILLIAM O. JENKINS.

Mr. LODGE. If I can have unanimous consent, I report back favorably with an amendment from the Committee on Foreign Relations a resolution of inquiry. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 224, submitted by Mr. KING on the 8th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and hereby is, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the Senate all information in his possession with respect to the recent forcible abduction of William O. Jenkins, consular agent of the United States at Puebla, Mexico; the indignities suffered by him during such abduction at the hands of Mexican nationals, and the means employed by said Jenkins to effectuate his liberation, together with the representations that have been made to the Mexican Government for the purposes of obtaining indemnification and reparation in the premises, and to secure that degree of protection for official representatives of the United States in Mexico that is accorded by civilized States to the diplomatic representatives of other powers, according to the usages and customs of international law and practice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. OWEN. What is the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. It is a resolution of inquiry in the case of Mr. Jenkins, who was abducted.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out all after the word "to," in line 11, and insert "report to the Senate what degree of protection for official representatives and other citizens of the United States in Mexico the United States has demanded from the Government of that Republic and what response has been made thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PLATT, Mr. MCFADDEN, Mr. DALE, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. WINGO managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, and other recognized educational institutions.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1373) to amend the Articles of War, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 10378. An act to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a resolution from the general assembly of the Philanthropic Literary Society of the University of North Carolina, indorsing the adoption of the league of nations.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE PHILANTHROPIC LITERARY SOCIETY,
"University of North Carolina.

"House Resolution No. 1, session fall term 1919.

"A resolution indorsing the adoption of the Paris covenant for a league of nations by the Senate of the United States.

"The General Assembly of the Philanthropic Literary Society do enact, That whereas the world is unanimous in the opinion that war and its results are but the relics of barbarianism in this present age; and

"That whereas in order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security, by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war, by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations, by the firm establishment of international law as to actual rule of conduct among governments, and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect with one another; and

"That whereas this covenant extends to all the world the principles of the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Monroe doctrine:

"Therefore be it resolved by the General Assembly of the Philanthropic Literary Society, That it recommend to the Senate of the United States the adoption of the Paris covenant of the league of nations as a means of establishing the integrity of the peace of the world.

"W. H. ANDREWS, Speaker.
"Per W. B. W.

"W. B. WOMBLE,
"Reading Clerk.

"Introduced by Mr. Kerr, of Warren.
"Passed by a vote of 24 against and 58 for the adoption.
"November 1, 1919."

Mr. COLT presented a resolution adopted by the Rhode Island Branch of the American Legion, favoring a clause in contracts giving preference to veterans of the war in the distribution of work, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Rhode Island Branch of the American Legion, favoring the enactment of legislation to enable veterans of the war to borrow from the Government 100 per cent of the value of a building to be used as a home, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Rhode Island Branch of the American Legion, affirming adherence to the "American's Creed" and subscribing to all the principles of patriotism and loyalty embodied therein, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Rhode Island Branch of the American Legion, favoring the enactment of legislation providing for the deportation of all aliens who withdrew their first naturalization papers in order to escape military service, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Rhode Island Branch of the American Legion, favoring an increase in the pay of officers and men in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Rhode Island Branch of the American Legion, favoring the enactment of legislation giving aid to the children of the men who were killed and wounded in the late war, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Rhode Island Branch of the American Legion, remonstrating against the development of Bolshevism and favoring the enactment of legislation necessary to curb this menace to free institutions, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Rhode Island Branch of the American Legion, favoring the employment of all lawful means to check and prevent the extension of the dangerous doctrines threatening our free institutions and our flag, etc., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3413) for the relief of Charles G. Griffa; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3414) for the relief of William Matthews; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3415) for the relief of the estate of F. Z. Tucker, deceased; and

A bill (S. 3416) for the relief of Elizabeth Bolger; to the Committee on Claims.

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The resolution (S. Res. 228) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed, through the full committee or through any subcommittee thereof, to investigate as speedily as possible the present Nation-wide bituminous-coal strike, the causes and reasons therefor, and ascertain the facts relating to the controversy, and especially the nationality of the miners in general, the conditions under which they work, the wages they are paid, the number of days of employment during the year, the reasons for lack of continuous employment, and who is to blame therefor, if anyone; how this condition can be remedied, and ascertain any other facts that may be necessary to advise the public fully relating to the reasons and causes for such strike, and suggest or recommend to Congress any measures that the National Government can take to ameliorate conditions, right wrongs and injustice, and prevent the recurrence of such strikes in the future.

The said committee is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time and place as it may deem necessary; to require, by subpœna or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpœnas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or subcommittee thereof. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The expense thereof shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the resolution be first referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, to pass upon the necessity for its adoption. Then, of course, it would go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reference of the resolution as suggested by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Education and Labor; in fact, I have no objection to the passage of the resolution; I think it ought to be passed. I only want to state that though the resolution is, perhaps, sufficiently broad to do what I think ought to be done, I think the Committee on Education and Labor ought to suggest an amendment, so that there can be no doubt about it, that the committee will not only investigate all that is specifically set out in the resolution for investigation, but that they will also investigate the issuing of the injunction by the court in this case.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to the committee amending the resolution to that effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have been furnished with an Associated Press dispatch relating to the coal strike, which I think will be of interest to the Senate, and I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Bulletin.

INDIANAPOLIS, November 11.

The United Mine Workers of America, through its general committee, decided to-day to obey the mandate of United States District Judge Anderson, which means the recall of the order for the strike of 425,000 bituminous-coal miners of the Nation. This decision was reached at 4.10 this morning, after more than 17 hours' discussion. The conference then adjourned until 2 p. m.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have investigated this subject considerably, and I am satisfied that there is an element of justice in the complaint which has been made by the miners to the effect that under present conditions they are entitled under all the equities to an increase in their wages. What amount I do not know. I know that is the feeling prevailing among many of the good, substantial coal operators in my section of the country, and I see no reason why an amicable adjustment of this question can not be made.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, a resolution adopted at a mass meeting held at Morristown, Tenn., in reference to the prevailing violence and disorder in the country.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"We, your committee, beg to submit the following preamble and resolutions for your consideration:

"Whereas a spirit of unrest, disregard for law, opposition to constituted authority, anarchy, and revolution is now prevalent in our country, manifesting itself sometimes under the guise of organizations purporting to alleviate oppression, sometimes by outspoken hostilities to our system of government, sometimes by threats of violence and activity of mobs, in other instances by organizations tending to retard the resumption of and restoration to normal conditions, hampering commerce, retarding transportation, restricting production, and threatening to deprive the great masses of the people of the necessities of life, and in various other ways to override the Constitution, subvert our institutions, and defy all constituted government, and believing the time has come when all law-abiding citizens should assert themselves and proclaim their loyalty to our Government and its institutions: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the citizens of Hamblen County, Tenn., in mass meeting assembled, as follows:

"First. That we hereby express our confidence in the constituted Government of the United States, and declare our fidelity to its Constitution, which we believe to have been wisely promulgated; that it safeguards the life and liberties of the people in the best conceivable manner; and we pledge ourselves to support its constituted authorities in their every effort to preserve its institutions and to enforce its laws.

"Second. That we pledge ourselves to support the constituted authorities of the State of Tennessee in their efforts to preserve order and enforce its laws against mobs, insurrections, anarchists, revolutionists, and all secret or avowed enemies of our Commonwealth.

"Third. That we deprecate the spirit of lawlessness now existing in our State, whether manifested by mob violence, threatened destructiveness, anarchy, revolution, seditious teachings, and the interference with the personal liberties of any citizen to engage in employment when and where he please, regardless of the mandates of any organization to the contrary.

"Fourth. That the right of the individual citizen to acquire and hold property is an inalienable right in which he should be protected.

"Fifth. That we oppose the assumed authority of either capital or labor to organize for selfish purposes, to retard business, restrict production, to engage in profiteering, and to interfere with transportation in such manner as to deprive the masses of the necessaries of life.

"Sixth. That we oppose immigration into the United States, except under such restrictions as will not interfere with the welfare of our people, our system of government, and our institutions.

"Seventh. That we favor the deportation of all foreigners who engage in disorderly conduct who are disreputable and undesirable, and we favor legislation for the banishment of all pretended American citizens who teach and practice disloyalty, anarchy, and revolution, and call upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to support all such measures as provide for the protection of our Government against all such personages.

"Eighth. That no unnaturalized alien should be allowed to own, hold, or inherit any real estate in the United States; that no person unable to speak the English language should be allowed to exercise the elective franchise or hold any office within the United States.

"Ninth. That all newspapers, publications, or written or printed matter intended for general reading or circulation, which is printed in any foreign language, shall be interlined with translations into English, so that the English-speaking people may know and understand the character of literature being read by foreigners.

"Tenth. That all public schools and institutions of learning shall be required to teach the English language as the leading and prevailing language of all such schools and institutions of learning.

"Eleventh. That a copy of these resolutions be furnished the press, the United States Senators of the State of Tennessee, and to our Representatives in Congress.

"Respectfully submitted November 3, 1919.

THE MORMON CHURCH.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to occupy more than about 15 minutes of the time of the Senate.

For over 16 years I have paid no attention whatever to any of the false and malicious newspaper reports and statements made against the so-called Mormon Church. The only excuse that I have to offer for doing so at this time is that I have received a request from members of a number of the principal clubs of the State of Utah to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to certain false statements published in different newspapers throughout the United States.

First, I desire to call attention to an article that appeared in the New York World of October 22, under the date line of London, October 21. This same article, I will state, was published in many other newspapers throughout the United States. It is as follows:

GIRLS, MORMON CONVERTS, WANT TO LEAVE ENGLAND.—FULLY 1,200 OF THEM, SAYS AUTHORESS, HAVE ASKED PASSPORTS SO THEY CAN GO TO UTAH.

LONDON, October 21.

Winifred Graham, the well-known English authoress, who has done much in this country to expose Mormonism, told the World correspondent to-day that fully 1,200 English girls have recently been persuaded by Mormon propagandists here to go to Utah. "During the war," she said, "the Mormons made great headway in the United Kingdom. I hope the American authorities will prevent the departure of these girls for America. From reliable sources I learn that there are 1,200 of them anxious to sail immediately. Only last week one was bound over in a London police court for falsification of a passport in her efforts to go to Utah."

Winifred Graham is the pen name of Mrs. Theodore Cory. She sails on the Baltic October 29 as the British delegate to the World Citizenship Congress in Pittsburgh, which begins November 9. She will speak on Mormonism. Her anti-Mormon work here, she says, has caused her to be shadowed and threatened by the Mormons. United States consuls are on the lookout for any Mormon converts. Owing to the strict passport regulations there is little chance that any of these English girls will be able to sail. Some of the girls to whom passport visés were refused recently were suspected of being Mormon converts.

Mr. President, I thought the time had arrived when the newspapers of the country would cease publishing such rot. How easy it is for any newspaper to send a representative to the Bureau of Immigration and find out just the number of immigrants entering the United States going to the State of Utah for any year in the past, and also to find out the professions and occupations of the immigrants, and the different classifications of each as provided by the department. If the newspaper doing so wants to publish the truth it would never publish such statements as I have just read.

I went to the department, upon my attention being called to the newspaper article, and asked for a statement of the number of immigrants for Utah for the years of 1917, 1918, and 1919. The statistics taken from the annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration show some interesting facts. I have taken the State of Utah and compared it with the State of Colorado and the following is the result:

Profession.	Utah.			Colorado.
	1917	1918	1919	1917	1918	1919
Professional	6	8	(1)	33	19	(1)
Skilled laborers	26	49	(1)	98	43	(1)
Miscellaneous occupations	501	202	(1)	448	185	(1)
No occupation (including women and children)	362	254	(1)	398	326	(1)
Grand total of all immigrants	965	513	588	977	573	738
Total of immigrants from England	118	48	(1)	136	56	(1)

[1] Figures not available.

The above table shows that the total number of immigrants with no occupation—including women and children—going to Utah was smaller on a percentage basis than the same class going to Colorado.

It also shows the percentage of English immigrants of the total which went to both States, the percentage being about the same.

Mr. President, the Commercial Club of Salt Lake City, the leading business club of the State of Utah, upon seeing this scurrilous article against the Mormon Church published throughout the United States, prepared and issued a statement, dated November 4, 1919, entitled "Refutation issued by the board of governors of the Commercial Club of Salt Lake City," which I desire to read, as follows:

NOVEMBER 4, 1919.

A statement of refutation issued by the board of governors of the Commercial Club of Salt Lake City.

The attention of the Salt Lake Commercial Club has been called to the appearance in newspapers in the United States of a "syndicate article" bearing the date line of London, England, in some instances as "October 19," from the pen of one purporting to be George Selden, writer of the English metropolis, which is vicious, inconsistent, and maliciously false in its accusations against the Mormon Church.

This article, sent broadcast through the United States, contains quotations credited to one Winifred Graham, to whom the article refers as novelist, some of which are as follows:

"What is Mormonism doing in England? It works secretly as in America and snaps its fingers at law in both countries. This very minute the church elders have 1,200 girls ready for shipment to Utah."

"The Mormon Church pays the fares and offers excellent wages, but once it gets women over it uses them as it pleases. The war gave the Mormon elders their greatest opportunity for proselyting. In the absence of the men folk and because of the deaths of thousands of soldiers the women of the poorer classes fell easy victims. Secret meetings were held in homes that attracted the neighborhood without attracting suspicion."

"Every girl is baptized. They then become silent about polygamy, but they become either polygamous wives or slaves of the Mormon Church. Occasionally we hear of girls who are slaving on Mormon farms."

The Commercial Club of Salt Lake City, Utah, through its duly constituted board of governors, hereby desires that it be known that it has taken cognizance of and read these statements, which it brands as being vicious in intent and so obviously inconsistent as to be their own refutation, and they are scandalous, pernicious, and false.

The commercial club, in line with its activities from the time of its organization, is critically persistent and thorough in its survey of conditions relating to the interests of our Commonwealth and is fully qualified by its knowledge of facts to thus brand these sensational stories as unmitigated falsehoods.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, commonly called the "Mormon" Church, is working in harmony with other institutions in Utah, ecclesiastical and civic, for the maintenance of the highest attainable standard of morality, and has made an enviable record in this accomplishment, as also in patriotic and devoted service to the country's needs.

This commercial club disavows and condemns with disapprobation equally strong the circulated falsehoods of Mormon interference in State or National politics. The Mormon people exercise their political rights and preferences in common with their fellow citizens who are not of their faith; and this club unhesitatingly affirms that the stories alleging Mormon control of political parties in this State or elsewhere are but myths and fables, without even the merit of apparent consistency to excuse their periodical retelling.

Lester D. Freed, president Commercial Club; H. N. Byrne, H. M. Chamberlain, Joseph Decker, Lester D. Freed, R. C. Gammel, C. B. Hawley, J. C. Howard, S. R. Inch, James Ingebretsen, A. Carlos Kimball, A. N. McKay, C. W. Nibley, F. C. Schramm, M. H. Sowles, Charles Tyng, board of governors.

Hereby we concur in the above statement of the Commercial Club of Salt Lake City.

John C. Cutler, former governor of State of Utah; W. S. McCornick, president McCornick & Co., bankers; J. E. Frick, justice Supreme Court of Utah; A. J. Weber, justice Supreme Court of Utah; E. E. Corfman, chief justice Supreme Court of Utah; Samuel Thurman, justice of Supreme Court of Utah; W. Mont Ferry, mayor of Salt Lake City; W. W. Armstrong, United States food administrator of Utah; Salt Lake Rotary Club, by Lew H. Harding, secretary Rotary Club, and by James W. Collins, president Rotary Club.

Mr. President, I protest against the libelous press matter that has been published throughout the country, that the blatantly heralded announcement of the falsehoods of an English writer of fiction has come here to tell. The church has nothing to conceal. I want the people of the United States to know that as far as polygamy is concerned it is dead, and scandalmongers in the future must find some other hobby to ride.

All I ask is that the Mormon Church and its adherents be judged by the fruit of the tree. No one can examine the record made by that people during the World War without coming to the conclusion that no more loyal people live on this earth. No call was made upon them without an immediate response, and not only for the amount asked for but for nearly double the amount in almost every case. They not only furnished their quota of soldiers but in some of the calls 100 and 200 per cent more.

Mr. President, I would not have taken the time of the Senate to make this short statement if it had not been requested of me. I will say this: The signers of the statement of refutation are at least three-fourths nonmembers of the Mormon Church, and they are the leading business men of the State. It seems to me that the people of this country ought now to understand the true situation; and if the New York World or the New York American desires to learn the truth about the Mormon people, I will gladly pay all expenses of a representative of either paper if it is desired to make an honest investigation.

I am a Senator of the United States. I represent all the people of Utah and not any church as such. I have never felt called upon to defend the Mormon Church against false attacks, because I felt that sooner or later the truth would be understood by all the people. I am not making this statement as a representative of the Mormon Church but as a United States Senator.

The Mormon Church has been foully misrepresented from many sources in the past. I confidently look forward to the day when the Mormon people will be known as they are and not as sometimes represented.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has spoken as he has. It was time for such a speech. A matchless maker of epigrams said that when "once a lie or a counterfeit statement gets into circulation it is well-nigh impossible to overtake it"; and therefore I believe the Senator has done a service to his country in exposing this infamous slander, which has been published broadcast against so many worthy people.

When I read the article, I felt offended because there are in Arizona a large number of Mormon people, or people who belong to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; and I would be false to that principle of fair play for which I have always pretended that I stood if I failed at this time to say a word on the subject.

It may be true that I do not understand fully the theology of the Mormon Church; but, Mr. President, the first church I ever attended was a Mormon Church. When there was no other church within 100 miles of the lonely frontier cabin where my parents lived, we found solace and comfort in attending the Mormon Church situated 9 miles distant. Our nearest—in fact, our only—neighbors for years were the Mormon people. Better neighbors no pioneer ever had. I am proud of the Mormon people. I am proud of the friendship that I have for them, and that I believe they have for me; and while, as I said before, I do not completely understand their theology, I am able to say here, in the Senate of the United States, that their church has elevated many intellects and purified many hearts in my State.

As pioneers in a new country, the Mormons are unrivaled. They are sober, industrious, frugal, honest. They are preeminently State builders; and to-day, if called upon to name a people who could most expeditiously transform a desert of swirling and heated sands into splendid fields and farms, I would unhesitatingly choose the Mormon people. In many places where once the cacti lifted its thorny arms into the brazen and heated air, Mormon industry has reared temples, hospitals, homes, factories, and schools.

Moreover, I never saw a Mormon I. W. W.; but I have, at some county courthouses in my State, heard disgruntled, lazy, and indolent men who did not belong to the Mormon Church sit on the steps of the courthouse and curse the Government and curse the President, while Mormon citizens were going into the same county courthouse to pay taxes without complaint.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield for a question.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not a tenet of the Mormons to teach and preach industry and thrift?

Mr. ASHURST. I am able to state that industry and thrift are amongst the foundation stones of the Mormon Church. Absolute and unquestioned obedience to law is a tenet of the Mormon Church. Respect for authority is one of the tenets of the Mormon Church. We need more of such people in these perilous times of the Republic; and again I would be false to every principle of justice and to every sentiment of gratitude if I failed to state at this time that when savage Indians galloped along by our pioneer homes, burning and murdering, plundering and scalping as they went, it was to the Mormon people that my defenseless but heroic parents went for refuge and defense.

So, Mr. President, I say the Senator from Utah has done well in "scotching" this falsehood, which has been given such wide circulation. I believe the American people are coming at last fully to understand the Mormon people. Their temples, schools, fields, homes, industry, frugality, their morality and their patriotism testify for them in more eloquent terms than the Senator or I could speak. Then, again, observe their Representatives in the House and in the Senate. Look at the high class of public servants they send here. I ask that the Mormons be judged as a people, judged as a religion, as the Senator says, by their fruits; and if they be judged by their fruits the verdict of the world will be in their favor.

It seems to me that the time should be welcomed in America when men shall not futher be assailed because of their religion or lack of religion. Men ought not further be assailed or discriminated against because of their particular view of how to follow the Master. America was built up, and one of the reasons why the migrations came from the old countries to these shores was that our ancestors desired to find a place to build free and strong States where such ignoble sentiments as bigotry could not survive.

Mr. President, I do not forget that this splendid domain of Arizona, one of the imperial States of this Union, came into being largely through the brave exploits of the Mormon people. When Gen. Stephen Kearney was beleaguered near San Diego during the Mexican War, and it seemed as though the Mexicans were going to capture and annihilate him and his entire command, it was the Mormon battalion that marched all the long way from Iowa into Tucson, Ariz., and occupied in Mexican territory a domain we now know as the Gadsen Purchase, which was purchased by our Government in 1854. When the commanding officer, Lieut. Col. St. George Cooke, entered the Mexican town of Tucson and raised the American flag, he issued a pronunciamento, and I wish the German outragers had read that document before they invaded Belgium. The lieutenant colonel entering the city of Tucson, nearly 1,500 miles from civilization, said in his manifesto to the people of Mexico:

> We do not war upon civilians. We make war against men in uniform only. The property of individuals will be held sacred. All civil rights will be upheld. Those who obey the law and conform to order will be protected.

The command remained there some days to refresh itself and then marched on to the relief of Gen. Kearney, who, as I said, was beleagured and surrounded near San Diego.

So, Mr. President, the Mormon people, as pioneers, as State builders, as statesmen, as people of industry and patriotism in every department of life, compare well and favorably with the general mass of their fellow citizens. This much I feel I should have said; more than that I need not say.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have not and never have been a communicant of any church, and if I live to be as old again as I am now, I would not change. In my youth I was greatly impressed with a remark of Gibbon, that "all religions are to the vulgar equally true, to the philosopher equally false, and to the statesman equally useful," and the experience of mature years has served to deepen the impression. I have never been able to reconcile the tenets and doctrines of all religious faiths with that spirit of persecution and fanaticism they develop toward each other, and which has so many times culminated in destructive and decimating wars. I believe in religious toleration, without any conditions whatever, except those required by the tenets of morality and of law and order. Hence I have remained aloof from identification with any faith.

Up to this time I have never found occasion to publicly defend the Mormon people, because it has not seemed necessary; but I can not allow the occasion to pass without paying tribute to their morality and usefulness, not only to their own communities, but as exemplars to the whole country in parlous times like these.

Mr. President, when respect for the law is the exception and not the rule, when the different forces of society are so antagonistic that the political structure is menaced with danger, it is refreshing to note that the adherents of this faith have at all times been the advocates and the exponents of peace, of justice, of law, and of order; and however just the criticisms aimed against former institutions, the fact remains, as established by more than half a century of practice, that the communities professing the Mormon faith are among the best and highest exemplars of American citizenship.

During the war there was much disloyalty in America. Scarcely any Commonwealth was entirely free from it. During the war resistance to the draft occasionally punctuated our dispatches, and the expression of toleration or friendliness to the enemy was one of the commonest of occurrences. But during that critical period upon no occasion which I can remember did the people of Utah, Mormon and Gentile, fail to whole-heartedly, loyally, and enthusiastically respond to every call made by the Government for soldiers or for money. Not in a single instance did this people falter. Their splendid youth were given freely to our armies, and the blood of their boys sanctifies the soil of every battle field in France.

Every loan drive was responded to, not by the quota, but far beyond it, and in everything that contributed to good citizenship, to patriotism, to loyalty, and to love of country, these people were ever conspicuous; and it is due to them, as one of the representatives from a neighboring State wherein many of these people are located, and are among our best citizens, that I should say so.

We have not many Mormons in the State of Colorado. Some years ago a settlement was established in what is known as the San Luis Valley. It has grown, it has flourished, it is prosperous. Its people are law-abiding, they are industrious, they are hard working, they pay their debts, they obey and support the authorities. Bolshevism, anarchism, and socialism are foreign to the atmosphere of that community. They can not take root in such a soil.

These people are to-day, therefore, one of the pillars of the social, economic, and political systems of the country, whose removal might imperil the entire structure of our social, economic, and political life. Their faith I am not concerned with; their character and their achievements are a credit to them and an incalculable benefit to the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I wish to express my approval of and join in all that has been said by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] relative to those of the Mormon faith. We have in eastern Nevada a number of Mormon settlements. I have visited a number of them. I wish to say that there are no better citizens in the country than those of that faith. In one community that I know of, established over 40 years ago, there has never been a jail. I believe that is true of the others. These people never have any use for jails. Where they go, there law and order prevail, and thrift and economy are taught and practiced.

Mr. President, the record of the Mormon people throughout the war has been without a blemish. Their sons were amongst the first to enlist and their quota was quickly filled. They oversubscribed their proportion of Liberty bonds. Their patriotism has been of the highest order and without question.

There is much that can be said in their favor, Mr. President, but I shall not detain the Senate longer, as there are some Senators waiting to address the Senate on the proposed reservation to article 10. I am glad, however, of the opportunity to express my disapproval of the attack directed against the Mormons referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, just before adjournment yesterday the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] asked this question:

> I should like to ask the Senator what has become of the 14 points? Can they be found anywhere?

Mr. HITCHCOCK replied:

> Yes; they are practically embedded in the treaty.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, I have been unable to discover a trace of them.

I do not know whether that was intended to be humor, but I think it of sufficient importance, because of the standing of the Senator from Pennsylvania as the Republican leader in the Senate, to call attention to the 14 points and to the fact that they are provided for in the treaty with Germany and the other treaties which have been made.

The first point is:

> Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

That is covered by article 18, which reads:

> Every treaty or international engagement entered into hereafter by any members of the league shall be forthwith registered with the secretariat and shall as soon as possible be published by it. No such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered.

Articles 19 and 20 relate to similar matters, which I shall ask permission to insert without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> ARTICLE 19.
> The assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the league of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world.
> ARTICLE 20.
> The members of the league severally agree that this covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations or understandings inter se which are inconsistent with the terms thereof, and solemnly undertake that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms thereof.
> In case any member of the league shall, before becoming a member of the league, have undertaken any obligations inconsistent with the terms of this covenant, it shall be the duty of such member to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

Mr. OWEN. Point No. 2, in regard to navigation of the seas, was deliberately left open to future interpretation because of the controversies which related to it in Secretary Lansing's letter of November 5, 1918, and under the league covenant this question can be adjusted.

Point No. 3 is as follows:

> The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

That is covered by article 23, (e), as follows:

> Will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the league.

Point No. 4 is as follows:

> Adequate guarantees given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

That will be found covered by article 8, to which I call attention, to wit:

> The members of the league recognize that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

I will ask leave to insert the remainder of the article without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> The council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several Governments.
> Such plans shall be subject to reconsideration and revision at least every ten years.
> After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments, the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.
> The members of the league agree that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objections. The council shall advise how the evil effects attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented, due regard being had to the necessities of those members of the league which are not able to manufacture the munitions and implements of war necessary for their safety.
> The members of the league undertake to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military, naval, and air programmes and the condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to war-like purposes.

Mr. OWEN. Point No. 5 relates to a "free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interest of the populations concerned must have equal weight," and so forth.

That was provided for by mandatories under article 22, which I will ask leave to insert without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> ARTICLE 22.
> To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilisation and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this covenant.
> The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandatories on behalf of the league.
> The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions, and other similar circumstances.
> Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognised, subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the mandatory.

Other peoples, especially those of Central Africa, are at such a stage that the mandatory must be responsible for the administration of the territory under conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience and religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic, and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defence of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other members of the league.

There are territories, such as Southwest Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands, which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centres of civilisation, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the mandatory, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

In every case of mandate the mandatory shall render to the council an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the members of the league, be explicitly defined in each case by the council.

A permanent commission shall be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the mandatories and to advise the council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates.

Mr. OWEN. The evacuation of Russian territory is the sixth point. That has been demanded by the Entente Allies and conceded by Germany and its allies.

Point No. 7 is as follows:

Belgium, the whole world will agree, must be evacuated and restored, without any attempt to limit the sovereignty which she enjoys in common with all other free nations. No other single act will serve as this will serve to restore confidence among the nations in the laws which they have themselves set and determined for the government of their relations with one another. Without this healing act the whole structure and validity of international law is forever impaired.

That has been provided for, as everybody knows, and reparations are being paid now.

Point No. 8 is as follows:

All French territory should be freed and the invaded portions restored, and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine, which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly fifty years, should be righted, in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all.

That has been covered fully, and nobody disputes it.

Point No. 9 is as follows:

A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality.

That has been accomplished substantially, although under great difficulty and with some friction and criticism.

Point No. 10 is as follows:

The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development.

That has been abundantly provided for, and the people of Bohemia, Hungary, and Austria are now in position to carry out this principle.

Point No. 11 is as follows:

Roumania, Serbia, and Montenegro should be evacuated; occupied territories restored; Serbia accorded free and secure access to the sea; and the relations of the several Balkan States to one another determined by friendly counsel along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality; and international guarantees of the political and economic independence and territorial integrity of the several Balkan States should be entered into.

That has been carried out by the armistice and by the treaty, as far as at present humanly possible.

Point No. 12 is as follows:

The Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, but the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development, and the Dardanelles should be permanently opened as a free passage to the ships and commerce of all nations under international guarantees.

No man has any doubt that the treaty with Turkey will provide for carrying out this principle.

Point No. 13 is as follows:

An independent Polish State should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea, and whose political and economic independence and territorial integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant.

That has been provided for, as far as presently practicable. But as far as the covenant has provided, article 10 provides for a guarantee by international covenant of the territorial integrity and political independence of Poland among other member nations.

Point No. 14 is as follows, and I call the attention of the Senate, and particularly the Senator from Pennsylvania, to the fact that this is a serious obligation entered into on the field of battle as a means of obtaining peace, to which I take the liberty of directing his attention.

Mr. PENROSE. I beg the Senator's pardon. My attention was distracted for a moment. May I ask the Senator to repeat the statement he made?

Mr. OWEN. I was calling attention to the comment which the Senator from Pennsylvania made yesterday afternoon, whether in humor or not I really did not fully understand, in which he stated that he could not discover a trace of the 14 points in the treaty and covenant.

Mr. PENROSE. I can not.

Mr. OWEN. Then I have just pointed out to the Senate—and I am sorry the Senator's attention was diverted, because I can not now repeat it—where those 14 points are covered by the treaty and by the covenant. While the Senator was engaged in conversation a moment ago I was calling attention to number 13, about an independent Polish State which "should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea, and whose political and economic independence and territorial integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant."

To that all the Entente Allies subscribed——

Mr. PENROSE. Nothing has been done to Poland except to insult, neglect, and harass her.

Mr. OWEN. On the contrary, Poland has been given an independent status as a nation; has been given access to the Baltic Sea through Danzig, and is abundantly protected in its territory and independence by the treaty; and the covenant, provided we carry out the tenth article of the covenant, which provides for the political independence and territorial integrity of all member nations, will fully meet this end.

Mr. PENROSE. Did the Senator from Oklahoma notice an official statement from the Polish people, published at length in the New York Times of yesterday, expressing in most emphatic terms their resentment and anger at the way they have been treated?

Mr. OWEN. I did not; but I am now calling attention to what this treaty provides, and I will continue, with the Senator's permission, to do that.

Mr. PENROSE. Danzig has not been given to Poland, and, according to the gossipy reports from Paris, the so-called neck connecting Poland and Danzig was just big enough to be easily wrung. If the Senator would like to have this article read, I shall be glad to read it.

Mr. OWEN. I would be glad to have the Senator read it in his own time.

Mr. PENROSE. That will be entirely satisfactory. It is so absolutely contrary to the cheerful picture which the Senator paints that, while I did not intend to have it read, I feel it incumbent upon me now to take such action when the Senator concludes.

Mr. OWEN. I will give the Senator that opportunity.

Mr. PENROSE. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator began his remarks. I should have been here had I known he was going to take the floor on these points. I do not know what the Senator said about open covenants——

Mr. OWEN. I called attention in that case to the particular provision of the covenant of the league of nations which abundantly covers that point.

Mr. PENROSE. What about the meetings of the big four? Were the meetings of Mr. Wilson and the other three open and public?

Mr. OWEN. That was not within the scope of my discussion, and I prefer not to be diverted to a discussion of the big four at this time.

Mr. PENROSE. I can understand that the secrecy of the big four is a delicate subject.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator may entertain what opinion he pleases about the delicacy of that subject.

Mr. PENROSE. I am glad to be permitted to do so. I entered the Chamber also a little late to learn the explanation of the Senator regarding the freedom of the seas.

Mr. OWEN. I explained that status when the Senator was out of the Chamber.

Mr. PENROSE. As I was not here at the time, can the Senator enlighten me now in a few words?

Mr. OWEN. I shall be glad to do so. The letter of Secretary Lansing at that time stated that there were so many different interpretations as to what "freedom of the seas" meant that the Entente Allies preferred to leave that for further discussion and did not commit themselves on the point.

Mr. PENROSE. There was nearly as much doubt as that created by the wide range of development between being too proud to fight and peace without victory and going to Paris and eating them up.

Mr. OWEN. I do not care to divert this matter into personal comment and partisan criticism of the President of the United States.

Article 14 of the 14 points—and I call the Senator's special attention to it—provides that—

A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.

There was a declaration of principle by the President of the United States in which the Senate acquiesced.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. OWEN. I would prefer that the Senator would not interrupt me.

Mr. REED. But I would like to ask the Senator one question. By what official act did the Senate acquiesce?

Mr. OWEN. The acquiescence was by persistent and continued silence when this declaration was made to the world and was acted on by the Entente Allies and was accepted by them and was set forth in the letter of the Secretary of State to the German authorities, through the Swiss minister, on the 5th of November, 1918, as follows:

SIR: I have the honor to request you to transmit the following communication to the German Government—

At a time when we desired them to lay down their arms we put the conditions upon the people by which they did lay down their arms. If ever there was a contract between nations, it was the contract of November 5, 1918.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator please, I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. OWEN. I continue the reading:

In my note of October 23, 1918, I advised you that the President had transmitted his correspondence with the German authorities to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent, with the suggestion that, if those Governments were disposed to effect peace upon the terms and principles indicated, their military advisers and the military advisers of the United States be asked to submit to the Governments associated against Germany the necessary terms of such armistice as would fully protect the interests of the peoples involved and insure to the associated Governments the unrestricted power to safeguard and enforce the details of the peace to which the German Government had agreed, provided they deemed such an armistice possible from the military point of view.

The President is now in receipt of a memorandum of observations by the allied Governments on this correspondence, which is as follows:

"The allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence which has passed between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow, they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses. They must point out, however, that clause 2, relating to what is usually described as the freedom of the seas, is open to various interpretations, some of which they could not accept. They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.

"Further, in the conditions of peace laid down in his address to Congress of January 8, 1918, the President declared that invaded territories must be restored as well as evacuated and freed, and the allied Governments feel that no doubt ought to be allowed to exist as to what this provision implies. By it they understand that compensation will be made by Germany for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allies and their property by the aggression of Germany by land, by sea, and from the air."

So that the Entente Allies and the United States made an agreement with Germany involving these 14 points, all of which are covered in the treaty and in the covenant.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OWEN. For a question only.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that the contract so entered into at that time by all the nations was or ought to have been binding on all of them?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator. Then let me ask him this question: If that were true, did it not set aside any prior agreements that would conflict with it?

Mr. OWEN. I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. And if that be true, would it not then set aside the secret treaties that as a matter of fact were given full effect at the peace conference?

Mr. OWEN. To the extent they were in conflict, I think so. There is no difference about a reasonable interpretation of what this contract is, but I am calling attention to the fact that the United States and France and Great Britain and Italy and Japan agreed at that time in order to induce Germany to lay down her arms. We bought our peace by these promises. The promises became obligations of the first magnitude.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right. Will the Senator——

Mr. OWEN. I do not want to be interrupted further, if the Senator please, because I do not want to be diverted from the points I am making. I am making the point that we entered into a contract on the 5th of November, 1918; that Great Britain entered into a contract on that day; that Italy, France, and Japan entered into an agreement on that date to make a treaty of a general association of nations to provide specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranty of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small nations alike.

Mr. PENROSE. Who made the contract for the United States?

Mr. OWEN. The contract was made through the Executive department.

Mr. PENROSE. What right has the Executive department to make any contract binding the United States?

Mr. OWEN. The President of the United States in declaring these principles declared them to Congress itself in a message January 8, 1918, in the face of the Congress, with the Senator from Pennsylvania and every other Senator in his seat listening to these proposals and these principles, and not a word of protest did the Senator from Pennsylvania or any other Senator utter against the declaration of principles upon which we made this contract. He was announcing what the United States stood for and the conditions on which peace might be concluded. Congress accepted these principles and the world proclaimed them.

Mr. PENROSE. That is not a grant of authority. The President has no more authority to bind the United States than I have, and far be it from me to convey the impression that I concur in every proposition advanced in the Senate against which I do not rise and protest.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator did not discover a trace of the 14 points in the treaty which was made, and I am calling his attention to the fact that they loom very large in the treaty.

Mr. PENROSE. By omission.

Mr. OWEN. Well, the Senator can indulge in wit, but I am dealing with this matter seriously.

Mr. PENROSE. So am I.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no; I hardly think the Senator is serious.

Mr. PENROSE. As an American I feel humiliated and outraged at the conduct of the Executive of the United States in this instance——

Mr. OWEN. This is denunciation, not argument.

Mr. PENROSE. Going to Paris without authority, obsessed with an egotistical idea about a peace covenant which no one wanted or cared about.

Mr. OWEN. That is denunciation, not argument.

Mr. PENROSE. It is both.

Mr. OWEN. It is valid as neither.

The 14 points set up a declaration of principles, to which France and Great Britain and Italy and Japan agreed.

This fourteenth point, which I emphasize again, is this:

A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.

When you destroy article 10 you do not carry out that principle agreed on by all the Entente Allies with each other and with Germany as a condition on which peace was bought on the battle field.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to say a word, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] referred to me in his remarks?

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I can without losing the floor, I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I think it would be interesting for the Senate to hear—it is not very long——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania, before he replies to the Senator from Oklahoma, permit me to make a request for unanimous consent in connection with the consideration of a bill?

Mr. PENROSE. I think I will sit down, Mr. President, and take an opportunity to speak when I have the floor in my own right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. NORRIS. I have the floor, but I yield to the Senator from Illinois to introduce his bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not for the purpose of introducing a bill that I desire the floor, but it is for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that at 8 o'clock to-night the Senate meet to consider House bill 9821, which is known as the Metropolitan police bill, and to consider no other business at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. If I can yield without losing the floor, I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is my purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask a moment to make a statement along with the request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois presents a request for a unanimous-consent agreement, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. Mr. SHERMAN asks unanimous consent that the Senate meet at 8 o'clock this evening for the express purpose of considering the District of Columbia police bill, so called, and to transact no other business at that session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Illinois would make his request upon condition that the Senate is not in session at that time in the consideration of the peace treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that change.

Mr. KING. I object to the request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Utah objects. I wish to fix the responsibility and no longer have it carried by the District Committee of the Senate. The bill involves a matter of the very gravest concern. The police of Washington have withdrawn from their affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. They have come before the District Committee and have, I think, made a remarkably good impression upon the committee. They constitute a body of men numbering nearly 1,000; winter is approaching, and some of them with five children are living on $90 a month, or are attempting to do so. I think the responsibility for the failure to pass the bill after it has come here from the other House ought no longer to be carried by the District Committee of the Senate. Senators who wish to object to the consideration of the bill can do so, and I can relieve myself and my colleagues on the committee on both sides of the Chamber from that responsibility; but in fairness this bill ought to be considered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am greatly interested in the bill referred to by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I believe what the Senator from Illinois says is true, that we should have early action on the matter. We have been working on the treaty until 5.20 to 6 o'clock in the afternoon, and I should like to see the Senator from Illinois at half past 5 o'clock this evening renew his motion for the consideration of the bill. It might then be considered between the hours of 6 and 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion, when the hour comes at which we usually recess the Senator from Illinois can move that the Senate recess until 8 o'clock for the purpose of considering the bill named by him at that hour. That ought to be done. The bill ought to be disposed of.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Illinois, that an arrangement be made whereby we meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock for the purpose of considering the bill. That was the point that I had in view.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the hour, whether it be in the evening or forenoon.

Mr. KING. I thought probably we should be in session until 7 o'clock this evening in the consideration of the pending treaty, and I preferred to meet to-morrow morning.

Mr. KNOX. May I make an inquiry of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KNOX. Is the bill likely to provoke any considerable debate?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is likely that it will. I understand that several Senators are opposed to it as a general proposition.

Mr. KNOX. Then, the consideration of the bill will take some time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Illinois, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is recognized.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to say merely a word in reply to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] about the contract which he says the conference entered into when they began the negotiation of the treaty and, in fact, when the armistice was agreed to. I called attention to that contract previously in the Senate and placed in the RECORD what I believe constituted a binding contract between the nations; a contract that was the basis of the armistice; the contract under which hostilities were suspended. I agree with the Senator from Oklahoma that a contract was made, at least, so far as the President could make such a contract that would bind him in the peace negotiations, and a contract that superseded every other contract or treaty between any of the nations which would be in conflict with it. If that be true, if we start with that hypothesis, Mr. President, then it is my contention, and I do not believe it can be successfully disputed, that the peace treaty is a violation of practically all of the terms of that contract.

The first of the 14 points proclaims the idea of "open covenants openly arrived at," but the first thing that was done at the peace conference was to close the doors air-tight. Nobody was allowed, particularly in America, to ascertain what happened within. When this complete work was given to the world it was discovered that, in effect, it simply provided for giving legal operation and effect to all of the secret treaties that had been made prior to the armistice.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Did the Senator from Nebraska notice in yesterday's publications that Clemenceau's principal secretary in a public speech in Bordeaux had stated that the reason the sessions were held in secret was because the President of the United States insisted upon it as against his own judgment?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I regret to say that is true. Our own President himself violated at the first opportunity one of the most important provisions of the international agreement; and not only that, but we got from Europe a great deal of information which the President refused to give us here. But, Mr. President, it is known now all over the world that the secret treaties between England, France, and Japan by which Shantung was turned over to Japan were in absolute violation of the 14 points and of that proclamation, and hence of the agreement under which hostilities were suspended and the armistice entered into.

Mr. WATSON. And of the self-determination of peoples.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; they were an absolute violation of that portion of the 14 points that provides for self-determination. The treaty gives life to every secret treaty made by the nations during the war, and in every instance it is a violation of that contract made by all the nations by which the armistice was brought about.

Mr. President, I intended when I took the floor to say something in reference to the pending question. Yesterday a great deal of time was devoted—it almost seemed like a filibuster to me—by the friends of the treaty in offering motions the good faith of which has been openly questioned and not denied. My colleague, the leader in favor of the ratification of the treaty without amendment or reservation, waxed warm in showing how article 10 protected the little nations, the new nations which had been born and which were established by the peace treaty. Mr. President, that is the talking point; that is a good thing to talk about; but the real reason for article 10 is not in reference to the little nations, the new nations that were born by this treaty and brought into existence. Personally I believe article 10 ought to be stricken from the league covenant portion of the treaty, and I am going to vote for every motion that tends in that direction to take away its power and its influence.

It was not to help Czechoslovakia and Jugo-Slavia and the other small nationalities that article 10 was incorporated in the treaty. The real object, the prime object, of article 10 is to maintain the world supremacy of the British Empire, and the next object is to maintain the Japanese Empire with all the territory that she acquired and which she will acquire by virture of the treaty. Article 10 is the article that requires the Government of the United States to underwrite the boundaries of a new world that were made in secret treaties during the war between the various nations of the world. All of such secret treaties were in direct violation of the agreement entered into by all the nations on both sides of the war, including our own, by virtue of which the armistice was brought about and the war ended. Article 10 was not put into the league covenant in order to help the weak nations. It is there to stifle the cry of freedom from Ireland; it is there to keep in subjection the 400,000,000 of people in India; article 10 is there to compel Egypt to remain as a part of the British Empire; article 10 is in the treaty in order to nail down the coffin of Korea and hold Shantung in subjection to Japan, and we are the guarantors of it all. By its terms we are bound to turn a deaf ear to the struggling cry of freedom, no matter from what part of the world it may come, and we mortgage thereby the lifeblood of unborn American boys to stifle this cry and uphold the cruel aristocratic reign of greedy kings and pagan monarchs the world over.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, may I ask him if he has considered in connection with his remarks a statement recently made by the adviser of the British treasury that Europe, not including Great Britain—he enumerates other nations—will require within the next 12 months $8,000,000,000 of credit, which he invites us under article 10 and other articles to underwrite? With wealth double that of Great Britain and five or six times that of others of the principal nations, in that underwriting of a financial character, in addition to that of a governmental character referred to by the Senator, the United States, as the one great solvent nation in this concern, in which we apparently have bought an interest if we ratify the league, will undertake to carry the great burden of an $8,000,000,000 credit to rehabilitate industrial Europe as referred to in the interview by the treasury adviser of the British Empire.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have not tried to exhaust the reasons for article 10 as it applies more particularly to Great Britain and the other great nations of the world. I have not mentioned the financial aspect of it; but the Senator from Illinois in his question calls my attention to it; the interview to which he alludes refers to it. I have not said anything about Persia to-day; but, Mr. President, we are loaning money to Great Britain at 4½ per cent. She has taken over Persia, and is loaning it to Persia at 7 per cent. The Persian people are going to bear the burden of a great portion of the money that we loan in order that the Government to which we loan it may make a profit out of it financially. We are going to bear the burdens of the financial world as well as those I have mentioned.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am sure every Senator was astounded at the claim made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] that the 14 points have been complied with in this treaty. I did not suppose there was a single Senator upon either side of the aisle who would make that claim. Practically all of the speeches on the other side of the aisle relating to this subject have been apologies for the violation of several of these 14 points; and it remains for the Senator from Oklahoma for the first time to make the claim that the 14 points are found in this treaty, when the Senator from Oklahoma must have known, as every intelligent man, woman, and child in the United States must know, that there are many of these 14 points that have been most flagrantly violated; and that is especially true of the first one, with reference to "open covenants openly arrived at," when we are now told by Premier Clemenceau that it was the author of that point who himself insisted upon its violation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am disposed to share the view expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin that the 14 points are not as much in evidence in the treaty as they ought to be, or at least not as much as I should like to see them there; but I will ask the Senator if he does not think that fact is due, to no little extent, to the fact that the President of the United States, who promulgated them, did not receive in his own country the support that he might reasonably expect?

Mr. LENROOT. I will say, in reply to that, that the President received support by acquiesence in all of these 14 points at a time when there were many of us who, if we had felt free to do so, would have criticized some features of the 14 points; and yet Senators now say that because we were silent at that time, if they had been in this treaty in full, we ought to refrain from even criticizing any of them.

Mr. President, it is well known that while the great majority did agree with the principles of most of these 14 points—and I was one of them—at that time, in the interest of this country, in the interest of carrying on the war, it would have been most unfortunate if we had had a division in this country at that time and a controversy over what was to follow the winning of the war, as to what should happen, as to determining at that time all of the principles that should govern in the making of the peace.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. May I not also suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that the President issued the proclamation of the 14 points, and the President, the same man, made the treaty on behalf of the United States, so that whatever estoppel or whatever objection may come to Congress it certainly can not apply to him, because it is the same man who gave utterance to the 14 points who made the treaty?

Mr. LENROOT. I was just going to come to that and say, Mr. President, that so far as the first point is concerned the Senator from Montana can not claim that the President failed to receive support in the Senate of the United States for that point. Indeed, Senators on this side of the aisle at all times indorsed that point, and the President himself was the one who insisted upon its violation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, is it not a fact that while the President was struggling at Paris to get recognition of the 14 points in the treaty, they were made the subject of constant derision upon the Republican side of this Chamber?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know that that is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will assert it is a fact.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I want to inquire if the Senator from Wisconsin, upon considering all of the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma on the 14 points, got the same impression that I did—not that he was insisting that they were vital and possessed virility in this discussion, but that he was resurrecting the dead and attempting to galvanize them into a semblance of life? They made that impression on me.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course the point that the Senator from Oklahoma endeavored to make—and that is why I am speaking upon it at all—is that because the last of the 14 points embodied the principle contained in article 10, a contract was made, and we are bound by it; and the point I want to make is that we are not bound by that article, especially when it is shown that the other points were clearly violated in this treaty, and the President himself was a party to their violation.

The next point is freedom of the seas. Can any Senator find with a microscope anything in this treaty fulfilling that declaration of the freedom of the seas? Is it not admitted by everyone that it was deliberately abandoned by the President of the United States, and that he never made even an attempt to secure in this treaty anything with reference to that point?

So with disarmament. The fourth point reads that adequate guaranties shall be given and taken for disarmament. There is no guaranty of any kind in this treaty for that, except in the case of Germany and the other countries who are not members of the league.

And so I might go on. I have on a previous occasion analyzed these 14 points; and with the utmost generosity in favor of the construction that the points have been complied with so far as possible, we find that 4 of them have been deliberately violated in this treaty; we find that only 6 of them, by the utmost stretch of the imagination, can be said to have been complied with; and we find that 4 of them are not mentioned at all in the treaty, because they relate to the boundaries of Italy, Czechoslovakia, and other countries with which this treaty has nothing to do.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. There seems to be much solicitude about the 14 points. I myself have been very much concerned; and I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, in view of the circumstances, whether he would support a reservation of this kind, which I have just drafted, and which I will submit and ask that it lie on the table:

> Inasmuch as the 14 points, so called, as declared by the President of the United States, were accepted as the basis of peace by all of the chief belligerent nations, the sole reservation being the interpretation on the part of Great Britain of the clause relating to the freedom of the seas, the United States reserves the right to interpret the covenant of the league and the treaty of peace in harmony with the principles laid down by the said 14 points, and does not consider itself bound to any line of conduct, military or financial, in conflict therewith.

I should like to ask the Senator if he would favor a reservation of that character?

Mr. LENROOT. I should want to give that matter some consideration, Mr. President; but I must confess that I am amazed at its being offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not know why the Senator should be amazed.

Mr. LENROOT. Because I had understood that the Senator from California was for this treaty. Is the Senator in favor of this reservation?

Mr. PHELAN. I am in favor of interpreting the treaty and the covenant in the light of the principles embodied in the 14 points, and I am setting up a torch here by which they may be read.

Mr. LENROOT. I could quite agree with the Senator upon that; but, as I understood his reading of the reservation, it goes much further, and provides that the United States shall decline to be bound by anything in the treaty that is inconsistent with the 14 points. Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. PHELAN. That is my position.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is, I must say to the Senator that I am surprised at his having voted against the reservations that have heretofore been proposed and adopted.

Mr. PHELAN. If the Senator will specify any particular provision that he considers not in harmony with these principles——

Mr. LENROOT. The one that is now pending is certainly of that character, because article 10 provides that we guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of nations whose boundaries are fixed and whose rights are fixed in the clearest violation of the 14 points. Then I am glad to know that the Senator intends to vote for this reservation to article 10.

Mr. PHELAN. I stated the other day, in the course of an address, at a time when the dismemberment of China was being discussed, and much solicitude was expressed for that country, that doubtless one of the purposes of article 10 was to prevent Japanese aggression in Asia. Now, there is an instance where article 10 will save the weaker nations and the smaller nations from the aggression of the greater nations; and in that campaign, which possibly might occur by reason of aggression, all the nations will be united. I do not anticipate under article 10 that all the nations will ever bind themselves together in actual warfare, because the mere knowledge that they are ready to act in harmony will prevent war, and article 10 in that light will be one of the principal weapons in the covenant by which war may be prevented. I do not have any great apprehensions about any evil influence growing out of article 10 on that account.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me see if I understand the Senator's position. I gather from him that he is in favor of article 10 as it stands; and article 10 as it stands will protect Japan's possession of Shantung, which is in clear violation of the 14 points. Now, the Senator, if I understand him, in a reservation that he proposes, would relieve the United States from that; but when we come to article 10 he insists that he proposes to vote for this article, which will compel the United States to protect Japan in its possession of Shantung and, if China shall attempt to secure Shantung for herself, that he will fight, not upon the side of China but upon the side of Japan.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not know that the Shantung case should be discussed here again. The Shantung case consists simply in a lease transferred to Japan by reason of her conquest of Shantung, which was at that time, so far as the lease is concerned, a German possession, and had been so for 21 years. I suppose Japan could invoke the aid of the league under article 10 for the protection of her rights, so acquired and so conceded to her by an exchange of notes between her and France and Great Britain and Italy, and even Russia. I think Japan is perfectly secure in her possession of those rights, and I think, furthermore, that she will comply with the request of the President and keep her own promise that she will return them in her own way, reserving only certain railroad and port privileges, so that there will be no parting of sovereignty. China doubtless will recover her sovereignty of that peninsula.

However, that is a mere incident in a great war; and, for my part, I prefer to keep Japan on that side of the water rather than on this side; and if an indulgence of this kind would lead her to exploit Asia rather than America, if it must be a choice between the two, I would rather give her a field in Asia.

Mr. LENROOT. In other words, I gather that the Senator's position is, then, that by a general reservation he would relieve the United States from any obligation imposed in the treaty that is in violation of the 14 points, but when it comes to a case of a specific violation he is willing to indorse the violation.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator, I think, puts me in a false position, because I have sought to explain that the Shantung case is not in point, because Shantung has been already acquired by Japan, and it has been removed from the field of discussion by reason of the fact that all of the great powers except the United States have accepted the situation.

Mr. LENROOT. So have they accepted all the other provisions of the treaty that the Senator now, by reservation, asks to be relieved from.

Mr. PHELAN. No; I do not follow the Senator. The United States, maintaining the political independence of countries now existing, and their territorial integrity, finds that Shantung has actually been taken from China in this war by an act of war, which is confirmed by treaties with all the other belligerent powers except the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. Ah, but if the 14 points are inviolate, were not all of those prior treaties abrogated by the acceptance of the 14 points?

Mr. PHELAN. That is a question which I am not ready to answer. They were not, however, abrogated in terms.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me, then, ask the Senator another question. The fifth of the 14 points reads:

> A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined.

Now, the Senator says that Japan having gained Shantung by conquest, it is all right, although the fifth point denounces any such acquisition.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. PHELAN. I think from the liberal principles expressed by the Senator, and his doubtless sincere desire to reconstruct the world on the principles of the 14 points, he can not object to my reservation. It is quite immaterial, so far as the discussion is concerned, how, in one instance or another, the 14 points, if enforced, would change the constitution of the league or the terms of the treaty. My only desire in offering this reservation is to give those who will finally interpret the league and the treaty a light by which to read it, that it shall set up these principles to which we are all devoted, and endeavor to have those men who will ultimately interpret the treaty interpret it on the lines which we so ardently desire.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I very much hope that the Senator will introduce such a reservation, because it will certainly help to clarify the Senator's position, at least as to the extent to which he is willing to modify the obligations of this treaty. But, Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from California that with his reservation in the phraseology in which he presents it, we are relieved of all obligations in violation of the 14 points, and the very first of the 14 points consists of the promise that these shall be open covenants openly arrived at. It is admitted that this whole treaty was made in secret. There were no open covenants. They were not openly arrived at; and, as I understand the Senator's reservation, if it would relieve us of any obligation under this treaty that was not in accord with the 14 points, it would relieve us of every obligation under the treaty.

But, Mr. President, I rose to make this point: The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] attempted to establish that here was a contractual relation growing out of the acceptance of the 14 points, and therefore we are morally bound to accept the provisions of article 11. But it became necessary for him, in order to sustain that position, to attempt to show that the 14 points had been complied with, and the moment that it is shown that any of them had been violated then the obligation, if any there was, upon the United States to accept the provisions of the 14 points was absolutely done away with and avoided. No one can contend that the parties to a contract may violate all the provisions against them and then hold the other party to the contract to a provision that may be in their favor. Nothing could be more elementary. Conceding to the fullest extent the initial obligation under the 14 points, there is no obligation upon the United States in this treaty to accept a single one of them, and that is particularly true with reference to article 10, when the other parts of the points of President Wilson have been so flagrantly violated, and the violation of one of them insisted upon by himself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I was very much interested in the debate the latter part of yesterday afternoon, and especially in the views expressed by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], from which, however, I differ. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska expressed the opinion that this reservation is a "direct and offensive repudiation" of a statement in the covenant of the league; that it is a "direct and obnoxious" repudiation of the spirit of the league. Mr. President, I hope it is a direct repudiation of part of article 10, for a part of article 10 is very obnoxious. Anything less than a repudiation of a part of article 10 does not leave this treaty where it ought to be ratified. And if article 10 is to be retained unchanged or the treaty not ratified, then I do not think the treaty will be ratified.

Now, let us see just what article 10 does. True, it has been frequently read to the Senate, but I wish it read and reread, until the first part of it sinks into the minds of the people of this country, so that they will appreciate the necessity of a reservation which cuts out part of article 10.

I do not understand the reservation to be a mere construction or interpretation. With me it means more than an interpretation. It means the removal of a portion of article 10 to which I object.

It provides:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Let us see just what this means.

"The members of the league undertake"—that is to say, the United States undertakes——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; the United States. When you say "the members of the league," it means the United States as one of them undertakes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But, Mr. President, that is just exactly what we object to. You assume that the United States has the whole burden. It means the United States, Great Britain, Italy, France, and all the other members of the league.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not assume that the United States has the whole burden, but I do assume that the United States as one of the members of the league undertakes, and if the others fall down we must carry out the obligation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is a joint and several obligation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a several as well as a joint obligation, and when we say the members undertake, the United States, if it becomes a member with that language in the covenant, undertakes—undertakes to do what? "To respect." I am perfectly satisfied with that part of it. I wish to respect the territorial boundaries and existing political independence of all the members of the league. I do not wish to see my country seeking to acquire the territory of other countries or breaking down their governments. But this is what I object to: We undertake to preserve, that is to say, to protect against "external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league." The United States undertakes to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of each member of the league against external aggression.

That is not all, however. That is the definite obligation. But there is more that helps us to understand how we will protect it, helps us to understand how quickly we may act. The article proceeds:

In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

That is to say, we first assume a new obligation, not our old obligation, to Poland, to the Jugo-Slavs, and to the Czecho-Slovaks, growing out of the war; but now we are to assume a new obligation to every member of this league.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not alone to protect it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to suggest to the Senator that in my opinion he states the case perfectly correct; but I think the idea has not been sufficiently dwelt upon, that the undertaking to protect and preserve is not simply that we contract that we will do whatever is necessary to help the country whom we are trying to protect to protect itself, but that we guarantee the results. We undertake to successfully preserve it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Absolutely. You can not protect unless you do protect. We are to prevent any interference with the territory of members of the league through external aggression. It does not have to be all external aggression. If external aggression is a part of it, we must protect it. We must protect it and preserve it. Now, I will follow out the obligation and see how great it is.

Mr. OWEN rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator wish to ask me a question?

Mr. OWEN. I wanted to ask why the Senator insisted that this was a new obligation? Does he ignore the fourteenth point?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not consider that the 14 points place an obligation upon the United States of any kind, and I do not consider that they have been carried out.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator think that asking Germany to lay down her arms on the basis of those points imposed no obligation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it created an obligation, it created an obligation to Germany to give her the treatment promised by those 14 points. I do not desire to discuss that, because that is not the question now involved, and I do not understand that even the fourteenth provision went to the length to which this article goes.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest to the Senator that it created no obligation unless all the obligations were complied with.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unquestionably that is true. If they created an obligation to protect against external aggression the countries of the world, they obligated us to protect them only when each country, and each part of each country, was governed according to the wishes of the inhabitants of that country. Take Egypt, for example. It would be a guaranty on our part to protect the citizens of Egypt only when they were exercising the privilege of self-determination.

Under the 14 points it would be an obligation to protect the Chinamen of Shantung against external aggression by the Japanese. It would be an obligation to see that Koreans were set free, and that we would then protect them in their freedom against external aggression.

These countries have been denied the privilege of self-determination; they have been left subject nations, and now article 10 obligates members of the league to do just what the 14 points of President Wilson provided should not be done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator to show how individually and particularly binding this obligation is upon each and every member of the league, of which we are to be the most important. Will the Senator look at article 11? Any war or threat of war is not a matter of concern to the members of the league, but to the whole league. But here it is each individual member who makes these obligations jointly and severally.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly the language differs. In article 11 it is the league as a whole. In article 10 it is the members of the league, thereby binding them individually.

There can be no question that the correct construction of section 10 makes it a joint and several obligation, and we can read it, "The United States, aided by the others to the extent that they see fit to aid, but nevertheless the United States, undertakes to protect against external aggression."

Where does it carry us? Something over a hundred years ago France helped thirteen Colonies win their independence. If the nations of the world had been members of the league then, the balance of the members would have been called upon to come to this country and help England keep the Colonies subject.

Let us see how far it goes. This is not a proposition that we will carry out existing obligations to the Jugo-Slavs or the Poles. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] appeals in their behalf.

We have no actual obligation to the Jugo-Slavs, but I might be perfectly willing, with England, France, and Italy, to assume for a limited time an obligation to them. I object to the proposed treaty with reference to France because Italy is left out. Italy was one of the four great nations, including ourselves, that helped to whip the Germans. I would be glad to see the nations which whipped Germany make arrangements for a limited length of time to protect Poland and Jugo-Slavia or the Czecho-Slovaks if they will behave reasonably well and give an opportunity to do so.

But that is not article 10. Article 10 obligates us to protect the present territorial boundaries of every one of the 32 nations members of the league as well as all that join it hereafter. There can not be a war that may arise in the future into which this article will not carry us.

We start with about one-half of the world outside of the league. A war between any member of the league and an outside country would call us into the broil. It might force the balance of the world into a league against this league. But in every case practically in which there is a war hereafter we obligate ourselves to take part without knowing what it will be, without having a chance to consider it, without the opportunity to pass freely upon the question when it arises of whether we ought to enter war. The moral obligation to enter all wars should be cut out of article 10, or the treaty ought to be defeated.

Let us go a little further and see where this takes us. Take the case of India. There are over 300,000,000 people in India. There are people of the same nationality outside of India. Suppose they combine with the people of India and undertake to throw off the English control of India. This would be a case of external aggression. We must send our troops there to maintain the present government if external aid contributes in any way to the uprising.

Take the case of Egypt. There are many Mohammedans in Egypt. Suppose the Mohammedans from the outside—and there are over 70,000,000—should come to the aid of the people of Egypt. There are 13,000,000 population in Egypt. There are 35,000,000 population proper in England. Suppose outsiders should come to the assistance of the Egyptians in an effort to gain their freedom. We obligate ourselves to send our boys there to fight until we defeat them.

I have already referred to Shantung and Korea. If outsiders seek to help drive the Japs out of Korea or Shantung, our boys are obliged to go and fight to stop it.

Let us take the case of France. France has Algeria and Tunis and Indo-China. France has 49,000,000 subject people. If in the onward progress of the world a few years hence we are still in the league and any outside people seek to aid one of these people to shake off French control, we are obliged to help hold them under that control.

I wish my country to respect the territorial integrity of every country, but in the condition of the world it is unreasonable to pledge our boys to maintain the present status.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] said that this reservation was offensive, that it was obnoxious. I am not given to using extreme terms. I do not think they really strengthen debate. If I were I might well use his two words and say that the article he defends is offensive and obnoxious. I want to say that no man can defend it before the American people; no man can take a mixed audience in the United States with an opponent only partly his equal and defend placing an obligation upon the United States to send our boys throughout the world to protect and preserve existing territorial boundaries. How many wars will it mean? All of them. How many men will it take? Thousands and thousands of them. I know my friend from Nebraska believes the treaty will end all wars. Well, he has a very hopeful disposition. Three months ago the Senator knew the treaty was going through without a reservation. He is no truer prophet about war than he was about this treaty going through in that way. We must not pledge our boys to the future world wars misled by the hope that wars have ended.

If we turn to the statements of the President, we have the word of the President that the world is to be involved in wars and wars and wars. As late as January 25, 1919, he declared in the Paris conference:

> We are here to see that every people in the world shall choose its own masters and govern its own destinies, not as we wish but as they wish.
> We are about to see, in short, that the very foundations of this war are swept away. * * * Those foundations were the holding together of empires of unwilling subjects by the duress of arms. * * *
> And nothing less than the emancipation of the world from these things will accomplish peace.

These were noble sentiments, but they have not been accomplished. Have we had an emancipation? We freed a few people from German rule, but over half of the world to-day is under the domination of foreign rule. Little of the world has been emancipated, and by the President's declaration there will be no peace, there can be no hope for peace, but wars and wars are still ahead. Do not let the people of this country be fooled by the supposition that the league of nations stops war. I hope that the concert of nations, using their moral influence, may check war. I hope that wars may be lessened; God grant it; but do not pledge your boys to die in every war that comes, upon the delusion that no more will come.

Some think the league will be so strong no nation or people will dare defy it. Is the league as strong as were the forces against Germany when the war began? The United States will take the place of Russia, and Russia by its proximity seemed as great a menace to Germany as the United States.

The experience of the world shows that the nations even of the league may become involved in wars among themselves. They are now engaged in acts we can not honorably approve. The language of the covenant, filled with uncertain and doubtful provisions, will of itself furnish the causes for wars.

Why, the President, when he received the degree in Paris, declared what kind of a league of nations he wished. He said:

> My conception of a league of nations is just this: That it shall operate as the organized moral force throughout the world, and that whenever or wherever wrong and aggression are planned or contemplated this searching light of conscience will be turned upon them, and men everywhere will ask, What are the purposes you hold in your hearts against the fortunes of the world?

I am for that kind of a league. I am for that kind of an association of nations. I am glad to enter with them to use moral force to save the world, to offer something better than war, to check armament, to check the construction of fleets. But this provision in article 10 which I criticize is not one for moral force. It is the pledge of lead and sabers. It is the pledge of guns, or armies and battleships.

I can not vote to put a moral obligation upon my country to enter the wars of the world. Unless that is stricken out I shall not vote for the treaty. It is all well and good to do voluntary missionary work the world over. It is all well and good for men who wish to do so to go and fight the battles of the balance of the world. But when it is proposed for our country to assume an obligation to draft our boys and send them without their consent into all the wars of the world I shrink from it. I can not agree to place such a burden on them.

Are we willing for our own boys to be sacrificed? I fear it is the willingness to sacrifice somebody else's boy that leads to this kind of a proposition in a treaty? It is the generosity of giving up the life of some other woman's or man's son that gets votes for this kind of a treaty. I undertake to say that you can not assemble a thousand men, called to an open meeting in any community in the United States, and submit to them the question as to whether they wish the moral obligation placed upon the United States to send our boys under article 10 into the wars of the world for an indefinite time, that would not answer, "No." I tried this upon two large audiences in my own State. I first invited the mothers who were willing for their boys to go in under article 10 to indicate it by raising their hands, and not a hand went up. Then I invited the men, with the same result. You can not put article 10 unchanged on the American people. They will not stand it. If you put it on the American people, they will get out of this league at the first opportunity.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I merely wish to ask the Senator if under the provisions to which he objects all the other nations of the world who are members of the league are not similarly obligated provided the treaty shall be ratified?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; those who are in the league.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Then, I desire to follow that question with another, and to ask the Senator if the time might not come when the other great powers of the world might be of great benefit and a protection to the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; never. This is not intended to protect the United States. We do not own colonies all over the world; we have no people in subjugation; we have no territory that needs protection by outside aid. It was not intended to serve the people of the United States but to let them defend the balance of the nations, committing us to do so whether their cause be just or unjust.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield further to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that I concluded his line of argument would indicate the position which he has just stated; but I can not in any way agree with the position which he takes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I regret that the Senator can not; I am sorry he is so wrong.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GORE. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if he does not think if Mexico should ever recapture Texas that article 10 would obligate Haiti, Liberia, Hedjaz, and Siam to come here and help us to take it back?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We all know it would be a real service to have Hedjaz bring her people over her to defend us.

Of course, nobody supports article 10 for any such object; of course, nobody means that we need protection on our soil. It is needed to make us carry the burdens of the world protecting every other country. I might be willing to help feed them and give them our money; I am not complaining about the financial burden, although it will be very great; but what I am complaining about is sending our boys all over the world to die. That is what I object to. Let the occasion arise, if the situation is such that we are needed again to help protect France, we will answer the call. If we are needed somewhere else to help the weak, if we ought to do it we will do it; but do not undertake to put a moral obligation now that binds every future Congress to furnish our boys to every war, and that settles the question in advance.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] said that it was not our place to settle the matter for future Congresses. He misapprehends article 10. He said it was not our duty to determine the question for future Congresses, and yet he is supporting article 10 by which we now decide for the Congresses of the future. All we are asking by the reservation is to prevent article 10 from imposing a moral obligation upon future Congresses.

Now, Mr. President, let us come to the language of the reservation. It is not so strong as I want it; it does not go as far as I desire. I would have been glad for the reservation to have gone to the extent of freeing us from any obligation to use commercial pressure. The reservation that I offered several weeks ago went that far. The economic pressure is still permitted by this reservation. Well, I do not mind that so much; that is a mere financial loss. The thing which I really can not consent to is to pledge the lives of our boys to involuntary sacrifice under the draft, sending them all over the world to die on foreign soil.

Now, let us come to the language of this reservation. It is very mild:

3. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10—

It does not say that we will not act. If the time comes when there is occasion, when Congress feels that we should act, we will act. We simply say we decline to put the moral obligation in advance upon Congress; that we decline to assume a prior obligation; that is all—

or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress * * * shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

There is a clause of the reservation that I left out that does not really affect its meaning, but it is explanatory of what we leave to Congress, and it reads:

Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States.

Quite an argument has been made to show that the President can use the military and naval forces of the United States without waiting for Congress. Of course, he can in many instances, and he is doing it right now. It never was meant by this language to say that he could not. This language refers back to the provisions with reference to the treaty and the treaty obligation to use our soldiers; it is qualified and limited in its meaning to the treaty obligation to use our soldiers, so that they should not be sent abroad unless Congress authorized it. It would be made clearer, perhaps, if we added "for such purposes," but that language is immaterial. The real feature of the proviso is that it declares we shall not assume in advance the obligation of protecting the territorial integrity and political independence of every country which is a member of the league, and of every piece of property held by members of the league. Three of the members of the league are the great holders by control of foreign people. One-half the world nearly is held to-day under domination by Great Britain, by Japan, by France, and by Italy; yet, under article 10, if any external aggression was aiding the people of a particular locality, we would send our troops there to maintain the existing political government.

Now I come to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. He desires to add:

And the United States hereby releases all members of the league from any obligation to it under article 10 and declines to participate in any proceeding by the council authorized thereby.

Of course, that goes far beyond the reservation; that would make the reservation offensive. To vote for that would be almost to vote against the treaty. That is so plain that it can not be misunderstood. Any one who votes that "the United States hereby releases all members of the league from any obligation to it under article 10 and declines to participate in any proceeding by the council authorized thereby" declines to go into a conference, declines to hear their views, declines to use the moral power of the league, or to consider a particular case and determine what should be done.

I am unalterably opposed to a portion of article 10. It ought not to be left in the treaty. I have no idea it will be left in the treaty. I have no idea any treaty will be ratified which commits the United States to the wars of the world. I hope no such treaty will be ratified. I do not desire to discuss the subject further.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I had hoped to have an opportunity to reply to some statements which were made by the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] this morning on the 14 points, but another Senator got the floor, and I postponed what I had to say until later in the day. I do not now intend to take up the time of the Senate with any lengthy statement in reply to the Senator's explanation about the effectiveness and vigorous application of the 14 points, but he did refer among the points to that pertaining to Poland. I happen to have here from the New York Times of yesterday a very remarkable statement signed by some of the leading men of the new Polish Republic, which is most impressive to my mind. I have shown it this morning to several Senators, who have taken an active part in the discussion of the treaty, and they think it not only worthy of being inserted in the RECORD, but that it ought to be read to the Senate. While it will be generally recognized that I am not in the habit of detaining the Senate or of cumbering the RECORD with newspaper clippings, yet this being the official statement emanating from the Polish Republic, only as late as yesterday so far as its publication in America is concerned, I will ask that the Secretary read it.

It seems to me it is an ample answer to the declaration of the Senator from Oklahoma that the pledge to Poland had been generously and successfully carried out. I am not given to sudden enthusiasms, but I really think the statements in this official declaration are worthy of careful consideration. It illustrates beyond anything else how ignorant the Senate is regarding the different situations in Europe, for I think any Senator who takes the trouble to listen to the reading of this document will admit that it contains many remarkable statements which he, perhaps, has not had called to his attention. I ask that the Secretary read the statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harding	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Harris	McLean	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Harrison	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Henderson	New	Smoot
Capper	Hitchcock	Newberry	Spencer
Chamberlain	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Sterling
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Sutherland
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Trammell
Dial	Kendrick	Penrose	Underwood
Dillingham	Kenyon	Phipps	Wadsworth
Edge	Keyes	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Elkins	King	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Kirby	Reed	Williams
France	Knox	Robinson	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Sheppard
Gay	Lenroot	Simmons
Hale	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce again, in connection with this roll call, that my colleague, the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], is necessarily absent on account of illness. I will allow this notice to stand in connection with other roll calls that may be made during the afternoon.

Mr. REED. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness, being confined to his room.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is absent on account of sickness, and that he is paired on the votes to-day with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. It has been ordered that the article sent to the desk by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] shall be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the article. During the reading,

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if it would not serve his purpose to have this matter inserted in the RECORD without taking the time to read it?

Mr. PENROSE. It would serve my purpose, Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will read it.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be delighted to read it.

Mr. PENROSE. I asked to have it read at the request of several Senators, who told me that it was a most impressive document. It is signed officially by some of the leading magnates of the Polish Republic, and it is so absolutely contrary to the glowing statements the Senator from Oklahoma made concerning the treatment of Poland that I thought it pertinent to put it in, and then invite him to reply to it.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Oklahoma made no glowing statements about the treatment of Poland, except to point out that the establishment of Poland as a State had been agreed to by the 14 points, and that that had been done. I have no objection to its continuing to be read, if the Senator desires it. I thought it would save some time to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not desire it, unless some other Senator wants it read. It is a very remarkable document.

Mr. REED. Let it be read.

Mr. OWEN. It is being read to empty benches.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Missouri asks to have it read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the article, as follows:

POLES DENOUNCE TERMS OF TREATY—LEADING MEN OF NEW STATE JOIN IN A PROTEST AGAINST THE PEACE SETTLEMENT—"DIPLOMATS IMPOSED UPON"—THEY MAKE A BITTER ATTACK ON THE UKRAINIANS AND PROTEST AGAINST PROVISIONS FOR JEWS.

"Leading men of the new Polish Republic have united in 'an open letter to the allied nations,' in which they charge that 'the good faith and good will of the allied diplomats have been treacherously imposed upon by false information originating with our worst enemies' in drawing up the terms of the Polish settlement. The list of complaints touches nearly all the geographic and racial features of the Eastern settlement. It is charged that the Poles have received less consideration than the African Negro tribes, while the authors make a bitter attack on their Ukrainian neighbors and protest against the provisions relating to Jewish inhabitants of the country.

"The text of the open letter is given, in part, below:

"'The entire Polish Nation has shared during the whole duration of the war the aspirations of the European and American democracies. Polish volunteers have fought in large numbers on the side of the Allies in France. They fought also, though anonymously, while no one knew they were Poles, in Russia, in the Czecho-Slovak legions.

"'The legions of Gen. Pilsudski, who fought against Russian Czarism, the enemy of the Polish Nation as well as of any democracy, turned against Germany and Austria after the fall of the autocratic régime in Russia. Note their refusal to take the oath of loyalty to Besseler, the imprisonment of Gen. Pilsudski, the battle of Kaniow, Gen. Haller in Russia and France, the imprisonment of the former legionaires in Austria. It is not less essential to remind the world that Poland did not yield to German pressure and that she steadfastly refused to form a national army under the aegis and on the pay roll of the Germans. We did not create such an army solely because we did not want to fight against the Allies.

"'At the present hour, while the World War is being liquidated and the Allies are proceeding to the delimitation of national frontiers, we resent all the more the wrongs that have been committed against us, as, on various occasions, the Polish Nation has been less well treated than other allied nations.

SPECIFIC COMPLAINTS.

"'Contrary to the project which was unanimously accepted by the Cambon commission, composed of representatives of all the allied powers, the city and the district of Danzig, indispensable to the development and to the expansion of Poland, have been taken away from her notwithstanding the city's historical and geographic attachment to the mother country. It is said that this has been done for fear to harm some two hundred and odd thousand Germans who, together with Poles, inhabit the territory of the newly formed Free State. At the same time a territory inhabitated by more than 3,000,000 Germans has been given to Bohemia. Why?

"'The above-mentioned German territories, as well as Hungarian districts inhabited by Slovaks and Ruthenians, have been united with Bohemia without a plebiscite. On the other hand, a plebiscite has been decided upon in districts essentially and historically Polish, inhabited, though partially Germanized, by a genuinely Polish population. These are the districts of Cisztyn, Allenstein, and a part of the Kwidzyn-Marienveder district.

"'More than that: Notwithstanding sanctions and decisions already made public, upon a simple demand of defeated Germany, the victorious Allies are organizing a plebiscite in Upper Silesia, the possession of which is a sine qua non condition of our economic development—in that Upper Silesia of which the population, according to German statistics, consists of 1,250,000 Poles and only 650,000 Germans.

"'The insurrection, that bloody protest of the people of Upper Silesia against Prussian domination, though officially proved, has passed unnoticed. And yet negroes of the African colonies have at the same time been freed from the Prussian yoke without any plebiscite, such a measure having been dictated by purely humanitarian considerations. Have not the Allied powers the same regard for us as they have for African negroes? And if not, why?

"'The Vistula, a great and exclusively Polish river, the tributaries of which irrigate almost half of the territory of the Polish State, has been internationalized. Rivers like the Danube, the Rhine, the Elbe, the Oder, though also internationalized, are not essentially German rivers; the tributaries of the Oder River, for instance, are mostly Polish. And one must not forget that in that war the Poles were not defeated as the Germans were. The Moldau River is but a tributary of the Elbe, and the Czechs benefit more by the internationalization of the Elbe and other rivers than they lost by that of the Moldau River. The Poles are inclined to grant the Allies navigation privileges on the Vistula River.

"'The Allies do not benefit therefore by the internationalization of the Vistula. This measure, having no precedent in history, is of a nature to limit the sovereignty of the Polish State. It is harmful to the development of Polish navigation and weakens it economically with regard to Germany. Why?

"'It was necessary to carry on a diplomatic campaign of nine months' duration in order to obtain finally for the essentially Polish (as affirmed by the Czechs themselves) population of Upper Silesia, Spiz, and Orawa the right of self-determinaton by means of plebiscite. And it has been impossible to reach the only solution which imposed itself in this case, and which was to unite those essentially Polish territories with Poland without any plebiscite. Why?

ACCUSATIONS AGAINST UKRAINIANS.

"'Prussian atrocities have been the principal reasons which brought about American intervention in the World War. But it is worth while knowing that atrocities were committed in Galicia by the Ukrainians, a Bolshevist mob led by irresponsible provocators. These atrocities have been verified by an allied commission. They were by no means less cruel and even often surpassed in savagery the bestial acts committed by the Germans.

"'And yet those very same irresponsible Ukrainian provocators, calling themselves illegally representatives of the entire Ruthenian people of Galicia, have placed themselves under the protection of Governments which are allied with us—against us, against their own allies. (See order to Gen. Haller not to use Polish troops in Galicia.) The Entente took under its protection that very part of the Ruthenians in Galicia who called themselves Ukrainians, and who, before and during the war, were close partners of Austria and Prussia, those very people who succeeded in multiplying their criminal attempts, thanks to the help they received from Austria and Germany.

"'At the same time the facts that Galician Poles form two-fifths of the autochthonous population; that the majority of the Ruthenians desire to remain Polish; that the economic and intellectual development of Galicia is mainly the result of Polish efforts; that almost the entire history of that country is one with that of Poland; that upon this territory Poland has for centuries fought in defense of Europe against Mongol invasion, and does the same thing to-day defending Europe against Bolshevist invasion—all these facts and truths have been ignored.

"'Even Germany and Austria did not dare openly to tear away eastern Galicia from Poland, but they did it under the form of a secret treaty.

"'Did the allied powers, when annulling the published paragraphs of the Brest-Litovsk treaty, nourish the project to approve in some way or another its secret clause, inflicting upon us, their allies, an injury which even our enemies, even the protectors of the Ukraine, Austria, and Germany, did not dare do? Why?

"'Polish public opinion rejects all provisional measures which would be taken in Galician affairs. Not we, but the Ukrainians, chose war as a means to settle our differences. Not the Ukrainians, but we, won that war imposed upon us—a war which the Entente finally allowed us to carry on. It is impossible to annul the consequences of these facts.

DENIAL OF REPORTED POGROMS.

"'With regard to the "famous" pogroms we shall limit our arguments to exemplifying but two most salient facts.

"'After the liberation of Vilna the German press became very noisy, spreading rumors that on May 5 the Poles had organized a pogrom in Vilna, in which 2,000 Jews were murdered. Now, it has been verified (see New York Herald, Paris edition) by an American correspondent who happened to be in Vilna on that day that no pogroms happened in Vilna either on the above-mentioned date or at any time. "Investigating the story of alleged pogroms," writes this correspondent, "I have assured myself, and am in possession of proofs, that all news relating to the subject originated with the German wireless station in Koenigsberg. A whole series of similar fictitious stories has been forged."

"'At the time of the "famous Lemberg pogrom," which the Jews have represented before the public opinion of the whole world as a slaughter of innocent crowds (saying at the same time no word on the atrocious wholesale slaughter of the Jews in the Ukraine), it has been verified that the Jews were armed and were shooting at the Polish troops. As a result of those regrettable occurrences, which, by the way, have been condemned by all the Polish authorities, there were 34 Jewish victims, according to the official death registers of the Jews.

"'The blood of thousands of Poles murdered by the Ukrainians in Galicia seems to have weighed very lightly in the scale of the peace conference, constituted as a great court of justice. But the blood of 34 Jews in Lemberg has weighed so heavily on the other scale that, forgetting all the blood shed by the Christians, the peace conference went as far as to impose certain limitation upon the sovereignty of the Polish State, creating a commission of international control for the security of the Jews in Poland. Why?

"'In the Alsace and Lorraine question it has been agreed that only those Germans who were bona fide residents before 1871 and their descendants will enjoy in that country full civic rights. All others will be bound to obtain French citizenship in order to enjoy civic rights. No analogous restriction has been made with regard to the Germans in Poland (upper Silesia, Pozuania, and western Prussia). It is true that, with regard to the Germans, it had been proposed to fix such a date, namely, that of the establishment of the colonization committee (1886), but at the very last moment that date was changed to 1908, which appears as a tacit approval of the result of Bismarck's policies of extermination toward a Province which recently was still under Prussian domination. And quite recently all Jews, hundreds of thousands of Litwaks, total foreigners to our country, included, benefited by measures taken in their favor and granting them national minority rights in Poland. The Jews possess no such privileges either in England or in America. What are, therefore, the reasons and upon what are based the demands thus formulated to octroi such rights to the Jews in Poland? Is it not evident that such means of imposing a foreign tutelage upon a part of Polish citizens will result in aggravating the Jewish question in Poland, which has been sufficiently distorted by the reports of our enemies? Why?

"'In all the aforementioned questions the diplomats of the peace conference have refused to take into consideration, or have listened with an apparent absent-mindedness, the information furnished to them by our delegates as well as by their own experts who had been intrusted with the respective investigations. Their propositions have been rejected—all documents, impartial as they were, considered useless—any time they spoke in our favor. This is what happened with the proposition concerning Danzig and West Prussia, which had been agreed upon unanimously by the Cambon commission. The same thing happened with the opinion rendered by the Noulens mission with regard to Teschen, Silesia, and with that of Gen. Barthelemy, Col. Smith, and their fellow members with regard to eastern Galicia. We have every right to believe that the same thing will happen with all reports of almost all missions which are being sent to us in such a large number, the members of which are representatives of all allied countries, England and America included.

"'We express the conviction that the good faith and good will of the allied diplomats have been treacherously imposed upon by false information originating with our worst enemies, the Germans, who conspired furiously against us by means of their own agents as well as of Jewish, Ukrainian, Bolshevist agents, and others. Mr. Erzberger has publicly affirmed that Germany fears nothing more than a great and powerful Poland. Anything that is prejudicial to us is a triumph for Germany and increases her power to be used in a world's war to come.

"'And this is why, while expressing to the allied nations our deepest and eternal gratitude for the help they gave us in reconstructing the Polish State, we are bound to affirm in this solemn moment before the world and before history that as long as full justice is not granted to us, and as long as full amends are not done for our wrongs, the basis of European peace will not be such as it should be—neither secure nor durable.'

"The statement is signed by the committee of national defense in Lvov; the Roman Catholic archbishop of Lvov; the Armenian Catholic archbishop of Lvov; the superintendent of Protestant communities in Poland; the mayors of Warsaw, Posen, Lvov, and Cracow; the presidents of the principal universities; and editors of leading Polish papers."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, on a former occasion I expressed my views at some length upon this covenant of the league of nations, and I did not intend to consume any further time of the Senate in the discussion of that very important document. I do so now, for a few minutes only, solely for the reason that it seems to me there is unnecessarily a difference of views here as to the fundamental principle which underlies the construction of article 10. To my mind this article is one of the most important in this covenant. Its language is simple, it is short, and it seems to me there should be no radical difference as to just what it means.

But a few moments ago, when the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was addressing the Senate, a construction of this article was announced, which seems to have been concurred in by several other Senators, which to my mind is wholly inconsistent and not in accordance with the fundamental rules of construction which our legal writers have handed down to us without any exception.

I understand that this treaty is to be subjected to the same legal rules of construction as any contract between individuals. I know of no different rule which applies to the construction of a treaty which would not apply if the covenants of the treaty were an obligation as between individuals.

It was stated this morning that article 10 is a joint and several obligation, with emphasis upon the "several." It has been stated here to-day that under this article, if entered into by the United States, the United States would be bound, alone, unaided by any other nation, to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every other member of this league. It has been iterated and reiterated upon this floor that under this article, if entered into by the United States, the United States obligates herself, independent of the obligations of other countries, to send her boys into other lands to do police duty, to preserve independently the territorial integrity of each one of the other members of the league.

But, Mr. President, no Senator has presented any authority for any such rule of construction. If we take this article 10 and examine its language and the circumstances in which we find it there should be no doubt from a legal standpoint as to the construction which should be given to it.

The statement that this is a several contract, or a joint and several contract, is one of the most important statements which can be made in connection with this article. No authorities have been presented by any Senator who contends that this has any of the earmarks of a several obligation, but the statement is made, and is repeatedly made, without a suggestion of any of the well-known rules of construction to substantiate the statement.

After listening to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] a while ago, I concluded to send to the library to get a couple of well-recognized treatises upon the rules and construction of contracts. I am gratified to find that the impressions which I had in regard to the rules which should govern those constructions are borne out by these two authorities which I asked to have brought in to me.

In the first place, there is a presumption with reference to the question of whether the contract is joint or joint and several or not. There is a presumption which obtains when you take up a contract to analyze it, and that presumption is that wherever two or more people enter into an obligation the obligation is a joint obligation and not a joint and several obligation. I find that statement made in these two authorities in almost the words I have given.

In Hammon on Contracts——

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator be good enough to give me his opinion as to whether, if four men were to sign a $10,000 note together, that obligation would be joint or joint and several?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very glad the Senator has made that illustration. If there is any one thing which is established in the law of contracts, it is that where several people sign a note jointly it is a joint contract and not a joint and several one, unless there are words in the note which make it several and not joint.

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. SPENCER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will yield first to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Or unless there is a provision in the statute which operates to make such a contract a joint and several contract. I know of one or more States where it is expressly provided by statute that such a contract as is described by the Senator from Missouri shall constitute a joint and several contract. I agree with the Senator from New Mexico that in the absence of such a provision in the law or such an undertaking in the contract itself it ordinarily would be held to be a joint contract.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very glad to have heard the Senator from Arkansas make his statement, and I am glad to yield further to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. Do I understand the Senator to state that if the four men signed the note together and if three of them repudiated their signatures there would be no obligation upon the fourth one?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course if the other three did not sign it would be an obligation only of the one who signed.

Mr. SPENCER. In other words, the obligation is upon all of them and upon each independently. Each man is bound by it and for the full amount whatever happens to the other three. Is not that true?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not agree with the statement of the Senator from Missouri, but, to the contrary, the Senator must well remember that where a suit is brought upon a joint contract you must sue all or none, and that each one of those who are bound has a right to object to any suit being brought unless the suit is brought against all. That is a principle of procedure as to which there is no controversy among the authorities.

Mr. SPENCER. Is not this the crux of the matter—that if four men sign a note together for $10,000 the four men are not liable for $2,500 apiece, but each one of them has an individual liability for the full amount, and while the contract is joint in one sense it is also several in that each one of the signers is obliged for the entire amount? Is not that the Senator's view?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator has now stated a very correct rule of contract construction.

Mr. SPENCER. Does not that make the contract both joint and joint and several?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It certainly does not, and if it does the Senator fails to recognize that there is a difference between a joint contract and a joint and several contract.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Applying the Senator's principle to article 10, if the political independence of one nation were threatened by another nation and they called upon all the members of the league but all refused except the United States, would not the United States be bound to go to its aid alone?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I hope the Senator will ask me that question just a little later, because I do not want to overlook the very point he has made. I will try to make a note of it myself, so I will not forget it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. While the Senator is answering that question in due course I hope he will also answer this, because I would like to get his view. Suppose the United States and 31 other nations agreed to article 10. Suppose that article is violated by one of the nations attacking the other. Is the United States justified in refusing to go to war if any one of the 30 other nations that signed declines to go to war?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withhold that question also until I shall have had an opportunity to establish the proposition which I started out to establish and the application of that doctrine under article 10. I shall be very glad to discuss it with the Senator a little later.

I find this statement made in the work to which I have referred, Hammon on Contracts:

> An obligation performable by several promisors is presumed to be a joint promise as to them; not joint and several.

I read further from the same author, in another paragraph:

> An obligation which is on its face payable or performable by several promisors is presumptively a joint promise as to the promisors, and not joint and several, and the presumption is strengthened where the promisors have undertaken to accomplish together a single result.

In Leake on Contracts, at page 307, I find this statement:

> If the writing purports simply that the parties bind themselves or covenant, without more, the obligation or covenant is joint only, and not several.

At another paragraph by the same author:

> If the language of the contract is ambiguous, so that it is doubtful whether the parties intended the covenant to be joint or several, or both joint and several, the interests and relations of the parties may be referred to for the purpose of determining the proper construction of the instrument.

Reading again from Hammon on Contracts, from another paragraph, in section 382:

> But the promise is presumed to be joint where the consideration moves from the promisees jointly, so that they have a joint legal interest in the contract.

Now, Mr. President, let us look at article 10. Take its language. The article reads as follows:

> The members of the league undertake—

And I desire to call attention to the word "undertake," because where the contract is in the plural that has a bearing upon the construction which must be given to it.

Reading from article 10 further:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

Now, that is the language which we are to construe. It is an obligation to be entered into by a number of nations. Under every authority of which I have any knowledge that is presumed to be a joint contract, and not a joint and several contract, and that presumption obtains unless there be something in the entire contract to show absolutely a contrary intention of the parties. If the language is ambiguous, then we are justified in looking to the interests of the parties and the objects to be accomplished by the obligation.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If we do that, then I submit that, taking the league of nations from beginning to end, it has everywhere the earmarks of a joint obligation, and not a joint and several obligation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. Perhaps the Senator would like to have some real authoritative information upon the subject he is discussing?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will be very glad to receive any authoritative information.

Mr. KNOX. In the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations there were submitted the several drafts of the proposed league of nations, all of which had been submitted for comment to Messrs. Auchincloss and Miller, who were the international advisers of the President on this covenant. It was in one of its earlier stages of the formation of the covenant, but the principle was exactly the same. When the question whether or not a provision such as article 10 was a joint or several obligation. Messrs. Auchincloss and Miller reported to the President as follows:

> No lengthy discussion of the legal effect of language of guaranty will be attempted. The subject is very highly technical. One of the most famous illustrations is the discussion and doubt as to the guaranty of Luxemburg to the treaty of May 11, 1867. Perhaps every international lawyer would now agree that a guaranty several in form is more effectual than any other.
> But aside from any questions of several, joint, or collective guaranties and their proper language, the question of policy presented by this article in its first sentence is whether the United States should favor a guaranty of independence and integrity of every State by every other State.
> Such an agreement would destroy the Monroe doctrine. Under such an agreement Germany, as well as the United States and even despite the United States, would have been bound to support Venezuela against Great Britain in 1895. Under such an agreement Great Britain, France, and Japan might be bound to intervene in Chile or in Peru according to their views of the Tacna-Arica dispute either in addition to intervention by the United States.
> Indeed, any guaranty of independence and integrity means war by the guarantor if a breach of the independence or integrity of the guaranteed State is attempted and persisted in.
> What the United States has done, is doing, and will do for Europe is enough without making an unasked sacrifice of her interests and those of Latin-America by giving up a policy which has prevented the countries south of the Rio Grande from being like Africa—pawns in the diplomacy of Europe.
> That each power should covenant for itself to respect the integrity and independence of every other power in the league of nations and that failure to observe such a covenant should subject the covenant-breaking power to the sanctions of the league of nations is undoubted.

There could be no more positive language as to the fact that this is a several guaranty.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The article just read by the Senator from Pennsylvania is somewhat extended and I do not claim that I am able to grasp the entire purport of it. As I recall, the article which the Senator read did not undertake to be a construction of this article of the covenant. It is a comment as to what should or ought to be done and as to how it ought to be done.

I believe that there is one thought in article 10 which we might, for interpretative purposes, designate as a several obligation, that part of it which relates to the word "respect." That is an obligation which can only be performed by each nation for itself; in other words, the United States can not for Great Britain respect the territorial integrity of any other nation and have that the act of Great Britain. So as to the word "respect" as used in article 10, where it can only be performed by each individual as an individual, I quite agree that that becomes an obligation upon each individual nation and that it is purely a several obligation. It is not joint and several. It is not joint. It is several because it can possibly only be performed by each nation for itself. But when you come to the obligations, where all of the parties are bound to perform a single duty, a single thing to be accomplished, then I say, under every rule of statutory construction which can be produced, this is a joint contract and not a joint and several contract.

As I was proceeding to say, if there is any ambiguity about the language used, then, under the authority which I have read, we have a right to look to the interests of the various parties, the objects sought to be obtained. If we do that, can there be any question as to the intention of the parties who framed this instrument? You look to their interest. What is involved in this business? It is to preserve the peace of the world. It is to accomplish that, in part, through the prevention of territorial aggression. Territorial aggression has been the moving cause of the vast majority of wars that have occurred in the past; and so the general purpose is to prevent war, to preserve the peace of the world, and to do that by preserving the territorial integrity of the members of the league. In that, I submit that one nation has as great an interest as any other. There is no special advantage to either of these nations as an individual nation. There is no reason why the United States should desire that Roumania should not begin a war of aggression against Serbia, or that Hungary should not begin a war of aggression against Roumania, than any other nation. The United States has no greater interest in that than other nations—certainly no greater than any of the nations who have assented thus far to this covenant. Therefore, by the presumption which we must indulge when we take up this covenant, and a presumption which is fortified by an examination of the document itself, in accordance with every rule of construction of which I have any information—certainly no rule has been presented here to the contrary—I submit that it is time that we should cease making these statements, unless we are able to fortify them by some rule other than an ipse dixit pronounced in the Senate of the United States.

This treaty has been before the Senate now for four months. It has been discussed even longer than that. For two months it has been here, submitted under a report of the Committee on Foreign Relations; and even at this late day, when we are coming to vote upon a reservation to this identical article 10, with language as simple as it can be, there is this violent difference of opinion among able and experienced lawyers.

Another reason why this construction must be given to it is because of the remedy which is suggested. When we come to a contract between several individuals, a joint contract, as has already been stated in the colloquy between the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and myself, you can not sue one without suing all. That is one of the privileges which each party to a joint contract has; and whenever suit is brought upon a joint contract in a nisi prius court against less than the full number of the obligees, any one made a party to the suit, as every lawyer knows, has a right by a plea in abatement to have the suit dismissed unless the other obligees are brought into court.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Let me suggest a concrete case to the Senator that will perhaps bring the matter down to earth and out of the realm of academic discussion.

Suppose that a controversy should arise between Brazil and the Argentine, or between Peru and Chile, and Brazil should make an aggressive attack upon the Argentine, having for its object first the subjugation of the armies of the Argentine, and perhaps taking some territory; and suppose that the European powers, because of their poverty, or for other reasons, should decline, notwithstanding some unanimous action by the council, to aid in repelling the Brazilian assault, saying that the United States ought to bear the burden alone, or, at any rate, should decline to do anything. Does the Senator think that the United States, waiving the question of our duty under the Monroe doctrine, would owe no duty, no obligation to the Argentine to go to her aid to repel the Brazilian attack?

If I may be permitted one more concrete illustration so that I may get the Senator's view, suppose that there was a wanton attack by one nation upon another, and the council of the league got together and unanimously agreed upon the policy which should be pursued for the purpose of repelling this aggressive assault, and they recommended to the United States that our duty was to furnish a certain number of troops and a certain amount of money, but we or some other power that wanted to escape an unpleasant obligation or task or duty should induce Liberia or Hedjaz or Haiti to refuse absolutely to participate in the recommendations of the council. Does the Senator think that the United States could hide behind the refusal of one of those insignificant powers, or, indeed, a great power, and say, "This is an absolutely joint obligation, and if any one of the joint obligors refuses to do its duty we will not do our duty"? Is that the position of the Senator?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was just leading up to a construction of the second sentence of article 10, which I think will answer the Senator's inquiry and meet directly the point which he suggested in a hypothetical case.

As I was proceeding to say, where the obligation is between several individuals, the remedy in court is against all of the obligees, and anyone has a perfect right to insist that the suit shall not proceed until all the parties are brought into court. In international affairs, of course, there can be no court proceeding. There is no tribunal to enforce international obligations. Therefore, article 10 seeks to meet the situation and, to my mind, meets it very clearly and very effectively and in the only reasonable way in which it could be met.

The second sentence of article 10 says:

> In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Mr. President, that second sentence performs two purposes. The first purpose is to clarify, if need be, the meaning of the first sentence. That sentence makes it plain that the obligation of the first sentence is joint. If it is not a joint obligation, why provide that in case there is an infringement of the obligation the council shall meet and advise upon a plan to enforce it? If the obligation is individual, why not have left it to the individual nation to perform it in the way that each might choose for itself? But it did not do it. It provided that in the case of any such aggression, or threat of such aggression, the council should meet and advise upon a plan whereby this obligation shall be performed. What can that mean other than that it is a recognized joint obligation to be enforced in a joint way? And, inasmuch as there is no other means to enforce an obligation between nations, certainly the means provided by themselves in their covenant for its enforcement is necessarily exclusive.

Mr. President, the suggestion has been made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and I believe the same thought was embodied in the inquiry of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], as to what would occur if one of these nations represented on the council should fail to carry out its part of the obligation.

Mr. President, that is an interesting proposition. It is a thing which will likely occur. I believe that it is one of the infirmities of this league of nations that in so many instances there must be unanimity of conclusion and decision, but I am satisfied also that except for this unanimity of decision the nations would not enter into the covenant, and it is quite likely that some nation may refuse to agree to a plan whereby the provisions of this article may be enforced. If a nation should refuse to agree to a reasonable plan, that is simply one of the infirmities of this covenant, in my judgment.

But what this covenant does mean, and the obligation under it, in my judgment, is that whenever there is any threat of external aggression against any member of the league the United States, together with the other members of the council, will get together and will undertake to agree upon a reasonable plan which shall meet the approval of every member of that council.

That is the obligation here. There is no obligation, in my judgment, that if the other members of the council should decline to prevent a war of aggression upon another nation, the United States solely and alone must assume the responsibility of preserving the territorial integrity of that nation. There is no such obligation here, but there is an obligation for all the members of the council to get together and agree upon some plan which shall be reasonable, and if any one nation should fail to agree to a reasonable plan, then that nation, in my judgment, would be violating its obligation under this covenant. If the other nations proceeded, then they would do it outside this covenant of the league; they would do it for the sake of the peace of the world. We have no right, however, to presume that any nation which becomes a member of this council will fail to agree and come to a conclusion upon some reasonable plan for enforcing the obligation under this article.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me there——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to yield.

Mr. REED. I simply want to be sure that I understand the Senator; that is all. If I understand him, he holds this to be a joint obligation, and therefore that it is the duty of every nation signing the treaty to do its part to carry out the treaty; that that implies that some concert of action or plan will be worked out; and that that plan being worked out for the enforcement of the terms of the treaty, if any one nation refuses to comply with that plan and do its part the other nations are thereby released from taking any action, in which event he thinks they probably, outside of their obligations, might take some action.

Am I correct in that? I do not want to be captious about it. I just want to understand the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. My thought does not extend as far as I understood the Senator's proposition to go. The Senator assumed a case where the council does agree upon a plan and where, after it is agreed upon, the nation declines to go ahead in pursuance of it. To my mind, Mr. President, that is an unthinkable case. It is unthinkable because this council of the league of nations is not an outside entity, looking over the world with a spirit of domination. The members of this council are the representatives of the specified nations, and whenever a member of the council agrees to any plan it is in itself an agreement of the nation which he represents. I can conceive of no reason to presume that the representative of the United States on this council would ever agree to any plan to enforce the obligation of the United States under article 10 unless he knew that it met with the approval of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. REED. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but he is undertaking to answer my question, and is doing it very courteously and obligingly, of course. He is discussing a detail in my statement which I am perfectly willing to waive. I simply want to get at the Senator's view in regard to this.

Suppose that a nation invades the territory of another nation, contrary to the provisions of the treaty. There is then, of course, the Senator will agree, an obligation of some kind, joint or several, or both joint and several, resting upon the various nations to protect the country that has been invaded against the invasion. Now, the Senator holds that is a joint obligation. Suppose the invasion takes place. Does the Senator hold that the refusal of any one of the nations who have signed the league compact to do its part in defending the country that has been invaded releases all the other obligors?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. After the plan has been agreed upon?

Mr. REED. Either after or before. I will let the Senator state that in the alternative. Let him state it as he will; I just want to get the Senator's view; I do not care to argue it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am quite thankful to the Senator for making the inquiry and calling my attention to the point which is disturbing him, because I believe, from the remarks which the Senator from Missouri has previously made in some speeches, that he is disturbed about the meaning of article 10. At any rate, I feel that he should have some feeling of interest in the matter, because I think his interpretation is so clearly wrong.

But, answering the question of the Senator, he is assuming, first, a case where the members of the council do not agree upon any plan. In that case it must be evident that some one of the members of the council is not acting in good faith. It must be evident that some one of the members of the council must be seeking to avoid its responsibility under this covenant. We all know that in dealings between nations nothing can be accomplished except by unanimous consent. Whenever anything is to be done by a concert of action as between nations it is always accomplished by the ambassadors of the respective governments getting together and unanimously agreeing. It is the only way. Unless they do agree then there is no action, and so, when they come to consider this question of devising a plan to recommend to their respective Governments under article 10, of course, they can decline to agree upon a plan, but the obligation of the respective Governments is that they will agree upon a plan if the fact exists which would call for action. That, in my judgment, is the obligation under article 10. The only remedy provided in the covenant for the enforcement of article 10 is just that—that they will meet together and agree upon a plan. Throughout the covenant it is presumed that these nations are acting in good faith, that they will do this thing, and if they do not it is simply one of the infirmities of this covenant. We have got to presume that they will act in good faith, that they will agree upon a plan.

Then the Senator asks whether the other members would be relieved if the plan is not carried out by all the nations who are obligated under this covenant, after the plan is devised. I submit, Mr. President, that that becomes a question of good faith for the consideration of the respective nations at the time, because the obligors under this article are to act jointly and not severally in enforcing the obligations. I do not see how any other interpretation can be put upon it. There is no machinery provided in this entire covenant except that provided in the second sentence of this article, and when that machinery is set in motion, if any one nation wants to stop the machinery, if it wants to insist upon something else, then nothing has been agreed upon which can be carried out or is being carried out.

Mr. REED. Then that gets it to the point, if the Senator will pardon me, that refusal by any one nation to do its part under the covenant to protect the frontiers of another nation from assault releases every other nation. That is the Senator's view?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it releases them from the obligation under this article, in my judgment.

Mr. REED. That is what I wanted to get the Senator's view on.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And I say that is one of the infirmities of this controversy when it comes to the use of force. I do not see how any other construction can be given to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree entirely with the Senator in his statement that this is a joint obligation. It is not a joint and several obligation. It is understood that every one of the nations who are parties to the compact will join in the action to defend every other country from a war intended to deprive that country of its independence or its territory. But is it not true that the result might necessarily be a several action and not simply a joint action?

Let me illustrate it. Suppose, for instance, that Germany should make war upon France for the purpose of recovering the Provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. We will suppose that Haiti, who is a party to this league, is engaged in one of her annual or semiannual revolutions, and Haiti says she can take no part in a war to protect France against Germany. The obligation, though a joint obligation, has not been discharged, and the other nations, like Great Britain and the United States, notwithstanding it was a joint obligation, the spirit and purpose and agreement being to protect France and every other country, would unite their forces in good faith to protect France, in which some of the other nations refuse to assist them. So the effect of it might necessarily be several, even though there can be no question but that the obligation itself is simply a joint obligation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am sure there is no divergence of thought between the Senator from North Dakota and myself as to this proposition. What I particularly had in mind, in making the statements that I have made, was this, that before Haiti, in the illustration which the Senator gives, would have any burden imposed upon her, she must accept the burden, or, in other words, indorse the plan. If Haiti were in revolution, it is not reasonable at all to suppose that the council would impose any duty upon Haiti at that time which she could not readily perform. Secondly, Haiti would not be bound by the plan until after Haiti had accepted it.

I want to make this statement in this connection. I have no information, in the course of the dealings of nations since history dawned, where any nation agreed to perform a specific act and did not do it, if it had the power to do it. Good faith as between nations, according to my information, has been one of the most sacred things known to contractual relations in the history of the world. We must presume, when Haiti says she will make some contribution to the joint undertaking, that she will carry it out. If, of course, there is any reason why it should not be done, why she can not do it, is there any reason why the council should not meet again and relieve Haiti of this responsibility?

Mr. President, I shall not pursue that line of discussion further; but I thought it was important to say something upon that subject at this time, and if it is possible that there can be a clear understanding upon it, I think that it should be arrived at. My attention was first called to the importance of the subject by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in a speech which he delivered before the Republican convention in his State recently. I have here the interpretation which he gave to article 10, from which I read. He said:

> The next is article 10, the famous article which provides for a guaranty against external aggression of the territorial integrity and political independence of all the members of the league. It is an individual guaranty. It requires no action on the part of the league to operate. We to-day are guaranteeing Panama for obvious reasons. If there were 10 other countries guaranteeing Panama, joined with us, and Panama called upon us for the fulfillment of the guaranty, we are bound, no matter whether she calls on the other indorsers or not.

It seems to me that this question is a fundamental one, and there ought not to be any difference of opinion about it, and if I am wrong about it I should like to have some one suggest a line of reasoning which will show it. The authorities which you find everywhere are undisputed, under every rule of statutory construction which I have been able to find, and, if I am able to interpret them, classify this as a joint obligation, and not a joint and several or a several obligation.

Mr. President, the reservation which is proposed here by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in my judgment, absolves the United States from any obligation under article 10. That reservation reads:

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country * * * unless in any particular case the Congress * * * shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

I can not see that any other interpretation can be given to that reservation except that it denies any obligation on the part of the United States, and that if ever the United States participates in any degree in the preservation of the territorial integrity of another nation, it will enter upon that task without any obligation whatsoever. It will leave the United States just where the United States is to-day, without any obligation.

Of course, Congress, in the fullness of time, may discover that some nation is being imposed on, that there is territorial aggression, a war for conquest, and Congress may come to the assistance of some nation and prevent such aggression. But if it ever should in the future, in my judgment it would be without any obligation so to do, under this reservation to article 10.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to be willing to do something to bring to a consummation the purpose which this country has had in mind in this war. On yesterday the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] referred to the obligations under which we have placed ourselves with respect to some of these new-formed nations. I agree with him as to that. But I contend that there is another obligation which we will be violating if we emasculate article 10. We went into this war to preserve modern civilization, democratic civilization. It was that for which we fought in this war. If we abandon the obligation under article 10, what right have we to say that we have performed the obligation which we made to the civilized world to preserve civilization? Will we be performing our share? Can civilization be preserved unless you stop external aggression and wars of conquest?

Ever since history has recorded the events of time, we find that aggression, the idea of conquest, has ruled nations and produced substantially all the wars which the world has ever suffered. Can that be stopped without the United States joins in aiding and assisting the other nations to perform that tremendous service to civilization?

Moreover, Mr. President, we know to-day that this covenant has been ratified by the other great signatory powers to it. We know that it is going into existence, and I want to ask the American people if they are willing that the United States shall shirk its duty? Shall we at this time be deserters? Shall we say to our allies, "A part of the war is won"? To my mind the greater part is to come—the preservation of the peace of the world. Shall we say to them, in this hour of stress, that we are going to desert them and let them perform the very function for which the United States entered the war?

I am not willing, Mr. President, to take that position. I do not want the United States to become involved in any foreign wars unless it it necessary to preserve the peace of the world; but the time has passed when we can rely upon other nations to perform that vast service for us.

I do not want it said to the people of this country, who have contributed to the prosecution of this war, that the result of the war has not been accomplished; that the United States declines to further prosecute the war. This war must go on to its consummation. It is not only technically still in existence, but the war is still on until something is done to preserve the peace of the world.

I do not want to say to the people who have made sacrifices in this country, either through toil, through personal sacrifices, or through the loss of loved ones, that those sacrifices have been in vain.

It is true, in my judgment, that article 10 will not be brought into effect or become effective except in most extreme cases. I believe that the provisions of the covenant for arbitration, for conciliation and investigation, are so potent or will be so potent that the obligation under article 10 will not become necessary, but that with article 10 in the background to let those nations of the world which want to enter upon conquest or to enter upon external aggression understand that the great nations of the earth are ready to enforce the provisions of article 10, they will then arbitrate and will come to some understanding, and it will be unnecessary to apply the provisions of that article. But we want it there. We want to say to the world that this thing called war for conquest shall end. For the United States to withhold her voice while other nations are saying that to the rest of mankind, in my judgment, is misrepresenting the people of the United States. I do not believe the people want it done. It is a cowardly act, which no American citizen should tolerate. I am sure that the people of the United States want this country to bear its share of the burdens of world peace, of the preservation of peace, and the civilization of the world.

Do you want to shirk this duty? You Senators who have talked here from week to week about Americanism, about being American, I ask you if that is the spirit of America, if it is the spirit of America that America shall hold out to the world every inducement and every proffer of assistance which is necessary to the preservation of the peace of the world, and then take this action? War is so horrible that we want it stopped, and everybody who made any sacrifices in the war wants it stopped.

Again, you talk about the reduction of armament and of expenses being reduced in the building and operating of a navy. Is there a Senator here who does not feel that unless some plan is adopted for the preservation of the peace of the world without force there will be no reduction of armament and there will be no reduction of the size of the Navy? Do you want to keep up that old system which, to my mind, has disgraced the civilization of the past—let him who can get what he can and hold it? Do you want that to obtain? If you do not, give real strength and power to this covenant.

To my mind, you are saying to the people of the United States that during the ensuing years we are going to tax you to maintain a Navy, we are going to train all of your boys so that they can be conscripted in the defense of this country and as the sole power to defend the country and carry on its wars against the rest of the world.

Have you any doubt that if you destroy the efficacy of this covenant that the old order of things will obtain, that it will be continued? Do you want to see that? Do you want to say to the people of this country that the United States Senate is unable to propose any plan for the preservation of the peace of the world? Do you want to say to them that the United States Senate is unable to prepare a plan which shall make this thing called war, and which is so abhorrent to all of us, a thing of the past?

I appeal to you, Senators, because I know you have the majority. I appeal to you not to emasculate this covenant. I am sure I am just as good an American as any one of you. If there is any other kind of blood flowing in my veins I do not know it. But do not talk Americanism to us and in the next breath do a thing which I am satisfied will, if not for the present, at least in the future be repudiated by the American people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], leader of the minority, in advocating the treaty took occasion to denounce the Senate for its undue delay, stating that the treaty had been pending in the Senate for some four months; that everybody had made up his mind about how he wanted to vote on every question; that all the matters contained in the reservations had been debated in the general debate, which is pretty nearly true, and he denounced the opponents of the treaty for presuming to talk. We on this side have done very little talking since that time, most of the time being consumed by the proponents of the treaty. But at that psychological moment up rose the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and offered to the Senator from Nebraska a unanimous-consent agreement proposing that the Senate should vote on the treaty and all amendments and reservations and the resolution of ratification and take final action on or before the 12th day of November, which would be to-morrow; whereupon the Senator from Nebraska promptly objected. If he had consented we would have had this whole thing out of the way to-morrow.

Shortly after that the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] rose in his place and with majestic air and quivering voice and forefinger, denounced this side for occupying so much time upon matters that had been duly and lengthily considered, and the very next morning he was promptly on his feet with a stack of manuscript that thick [indicating], and proceeded to occupy the time of the Senate all the morning, and then induced two of his colleagues to consume what was left of the time, not for publication, but as a guaranty of good faith and sincerity.

Mr. President, I never want to do anything hastily in the Senate of the United States, but I have always agreed with those Senators who are demanding haste and that action be expedited. I am ready to vote at any time and, so far as I am concerned, to give unanimous consent to vote on any or all the reservations and on the resolution of ratification at any date anyone will name. But the minute a date is proposed we do not get an agreement.

I am getting a little weary of having the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senators who think these reservations ought to be added to the treaty denounced for holding it up and filibustering when those who are advocating it are consuming nine-tenths of the time. Article 10 has been debated for weeks and weeks here, and I do not think there is any occasion for any further debate on it. I am a member of the committee that reported the reservation pertaining to it. I do not believe I have spoken 5 minutes on it, and I do not intend to speak 30 seconds more. I hope we can vote on it.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	McKellar	Sheppard

Mr. REED. I desire to announce again that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is confined to his room by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have heard some new law this afternoon. It is that if 10 men sign a contract and 1 of them refuses to comply with the contract the other 9 are thereby released. If that were the case, nobody in the world would ever accept a contract with two signatures to it, because either of the signatories could arrange easily to be relieved by having the other individual repudiate the contract. Yet we have listened to a painful legal argument this afternoon with a pretended citation of authority to sustain that remarkable document.

The truth is that a joint obligation binds every member to the fulfillment of the entire obligation, and the default of any one of the signers neither releases him nor the others, but all are alike bound. It is true that if a number of individuals sign a contract to do a particular thing and the beneficiary of that contract voluntarily releases one of them from his contract, that may relieve the others; and if he brings suit, and does not join all of the joint obligors, there are two rules which then obtain, differing according to jurisdictions. One is that if he proceeds only against part, he has released a part, and thereby has voluntarily released all. The other rule, however, is that the remedy of those who are sued is to require the impleading of the other obligors with them as defendants. Mr. President, those two rules are merely made for the protection of the obligors, so that they may have in a court of law a judgment rendered against all at the same time; but if the judgment is rendered against all, it can be enforced against one, and that one man then has the right to go into other courts and require contribution, if he can get it.

What has all this to do with our obligation under article 10? In what court can we bring our suit? And if we were to bring our suit in a court, what kind of a judgment would be rendered? The truth is that if every man in this Senate signed a joint promissory note for $100,000, each of us might, under the common-law rule, insist when suit was brought that all of us should be sued; but as soon as the judgment was rendered the execution could issue against those opulent gentlemen who have the money, and they could not escape paying the entire sum because some of the rest of us were bankrupt or refused to pay.

Why have we had an hour and a half taken up with that sort of argument? Is anybody deceived by it? The whole argument was based upon the rule that applies to the remedy and not to the obligation, for, says the same author from whom the distinguished Senator quoted, Leake on Contracts:

> Each joint contractor becomes ultimately liable to the creditor for the whole, and not only for his proportionate part, though the contract be joint.

Why, Mr. President, without characterizing the argument of one of my brethren, a distinguished lawyer, as absurd, I venture to say that he formed the habit which he indulged to-day when he was arguing cases before a justice of the peace in some remote district of New Mexico. [Laughter.] I am sure he never presented it to the Supreme Court. I say that in all kindness, because I know the Senator to be a strong and analytical lawyer.

The character of argument made, however, furnishes a very good and solemn lesson. It is that the proponents of this treaty propose to justify it by any kind of—now, I must be parliamentary, and I find it difficult to select a word which will characterize this conduct and remain entirely within parliamentary rules—by any kind of argument, by any kind of a twisting and distorting of words from their real meaning, by giving unnatural constructions. Here, again, we are furnished with another illustration of the fact that every time these gentlemen present a question relating to the league of nations in which power and force are necessary to give strength to their argument, they find that the league of nations is omnipotent in its power and all embracing in the sweep of its mighty arms, but the moment they begin to discuss the responsibility of the American Nation they proclaim the doctrine that after all nobody is bound to do anything unless he wants to do it anyway, which reduces this covenant to this sort of absurd situation, that the various nations get together and agree that in a certain contingency each one of them will do the particular thing that it wants to do and that it would do if there were not any league of nations at all. I will defy any man who has listened to these debates to say candidly and honestly that that has not been the effect and the intendment and the course of argument.

When it is asserted by one of us that the United States by entering this covenant may be bound by the 6 votes of Great Britain to a matter in which it does not want to be bound, we are told that the 6 votes of Great Britain count for nothing; that we can only be bound when we ourselves consent; but at the same time we are told that these 6 votes cast in the assembly can elect the members of the council; that the council and assembly together constitute the government of the world; and that within the purview of their vast jurisdiction they hold control of every international dispute and embrace within the sweep—to use the language I employed before—of their arms all nations, kindreds, and tongues, and every people and every clime. You can not have both of those arguments. You either have a thing of power or you have "a thing of shreds and patches." You either have an instrumentality which will work, and work with mighty strength, or you have a fraud put upon the world, and a partial organization created to accomplish nothing. I will make this statement that I ought to make in this connection, that if you were setting up a tribunal to exercise only a moral influence, it might have some moral influence; but such, sir, is not the character of this organization.

Mr. President, these are but preliminary words to the subject I want to discuss. Another doctrine, new, startling, revolutionary, has been announced upon the floor of the Senate, and lest that same doctrine should be applied and the United States hereafter for all time be bound by it, I hasten to file my disclaimer. The new doctrine is if some individual officer of the Government makes a statement that that binds the American people unless the American people instantly repudiate it; that it binds the Senate unless the Senate shall instantly repudiate it; that if the President, the man happening to be President, not as an official act, but in the pursuit of his own ideas outside of his official duties and outside of any authority vested in him by the Constitution, simply exercising his right as a citizen to speak, expresses an opinion, that opinion binds not only the Congress of the United States but the people of the United States, no matter what the opinion may be; but that is especially true unless we all rise at once and protest. In other words, the doctrine of estoppel by silence is set up against a people and against a Government. Well, if we are appealing to principles of law, let me call attention to the fact that there can be no estoppel against the Government of the United States nor against any sovereign government; but I do not care to indulge in any such silly distinction or to apply a mere legal argument, a mere legal rule that applies between individuals.

More than that, the doctrine is asserted that if Elihu Root, whom I respect as a man, utters a declaration to a newspaper reporter in New York City expressing his opinion that the United States ought to guard the frontiers of Poland for the next five years, that creates a moral obligation upon the people of the United States to send their boys over there to die. It is the first time that I ever knew that the utterances of Elihu Root, or any other man, great or small, constituted a moral obligation on the part of the people of the United States; and yet four times in his speech on yesterday—I believe it was four times—the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] declared that Elihu Root had created such a moral obligation. Senator Root is a great lawyer, a private citizen, and a man for whom I have respect, but I decline to allow his utterances to become binding as a moral obligation on anybody but himself.

Right here I think we might as well get back to the fact that this is not a Government by Congress; it is not a Government by the Supreme Court; it is not a Government by the President; it is a Government of the people of the United States, made and established by them and speaking through certain authorized agents, the scope of whose authority is laid down in a Constitution that no man can change, although it may be disregarded and violated by men. It can be changed only by the people of the United States. The only way the President can bind the people of the United States is when he acts within the purview of his authority and exercises the powers that have been constitutionally imposed upon him. He has no more power or right by his individual statement to bind the people of the United States than has any other man in this country.

I say that with the utmost respect for the present incumbent of the office of President. I would say it, sir, if his great predecessor in office, Hon. William H. Taft, were still President of the United States. I say that the syndicated articles which Mr. Taft is now putting forth to the people of the United States and the world, at so much per line, just as much bind the people of the United States as would similar articles if written by the President of the United States.

Where would this doctrine leave us, that the President by his word of mouth, not in carrying out the power imposed upon him by the Constitution, but in carrying out his own ideas, could bind our people? In a moment's time he could involve us in every conceivable obligation by a speech made anywhere in the United States, whether in Boston, Mass., or Pueblo, Colo. He could involve the United States in obligations from which we might never escape. That is a power, sir, that was not claimed by any despot of ancient times, that his mere speech bound the people. Even those despots in the days of Draco wrote their decrees in the forms of law and posted them up for the people to read, sometimes so high they could not see them, it is said, but still they went through the form of posting them up. What new and un-American doctrine is this, that an individual sitting in the city of New York can declare that we ought to protect Poland for five years and that thereupon it becomes the duty of the Congress of the United States to conscript boys who live 3,000 miles from New York, put them into uniform, and send them across the ocean to die in the battles of other peoples? If our Congress has that power in a clear-cut case, I do not know it. We do have power to protect the people of the United States, and this Government has the power to call for every man and every woman and every child to protect its people; but I question, sir, whether we have the constitutional right in a clear-cut case to call out a single trooper, to conscript a single man, to fight the battles of other nations in whose quarrels we have no concern.

Mr. President, we have got so used to talking stuff here—I will use that common expression "stuff"—that it is time to call a halt. I have heard this talk about what the United States entered the war for, and, according to the new-spun theory, it appears that we entered the war for everything the particular individual who happens to be speaking imagined we entered it for; but the people of the United States, who own this country, who own this Government, and whose humble representatives we are—and sometimes we do not represent very well—are the ones who constitute this Government. We are only their agents, their servants, their employees, occupying these places for the few fleeting days. They have reserved to themselves the right to recall us—not to recall us, perhaps, until the end of a given period, but to recall us at the end of a given period of months. Recall us how? Every man sitting in the House of Representatives is subject to recall, at the end of the 24 months at the longest, by the election of a new man in his place—subject to recall by not electing him any more. Every man in this body is subject to recall at the end of six years by the people declining to elect him any more. And the President, the mere occupant of that office, however great he may be, is subject, according to the will of the American people, at the end of four years to be recalled. While we are mere transitory occupants of the position, the position remains, the Government continues; this great people through that Government continue to speak, and any man who speaks other than according to their will as laid down in the Constitution treacherously belies his position and treacherously betrays his people and his country, and usurpation is as vile a form of treachery as has ever defaced the character of a man or passed its bloody finger across the pages of history.

Now, sir, I want to call attention to some facts in regard to how we got into this war, and I think that as I proceed I can dissipate the mists that have been created by innumerable speeches and innumerable written articles, some of them from the lips and some of them from the pens of great men, but usually followed by a large brood of lesser men who are mere echoes of the great men who have first spoken. I am going to take a little time to follow this through, and when I get through I shall be glad to have somebody tell me when, where, and how the people of the United States became the guarantors of the peace of Europe.

Why, what is this doctrine we are hearing, that we went over to Europe and engaged in a war to save Europe; we stopped the onrushing Hun; we rolled back the bloody tidal wave of the German military machine, if I may so badly mix a metaphor; we saved Europe; and now, because we saved Europe, we have to stay over there and guard her and the rest of the world for all time? And if we do not do it, we are cowards. No—if we undertake it, we are fools.

I saw a cartoon which exactly illustrates it. I do not know what artist drew it. There was a muddy, filthy creek, out of which a bedraggled female had been dragged by old Uncle Sam, and in the process he had become a little muddied himself, standing on the banks, with the woman rescued. She is pictured as throwing her arms around Uncle Sam's neck and screaming, "You have saved me; now you have got to marry me." [Laughter.]

It is an exact parallel. We saved Europe, and now we are to be united to her in the holy bonds of matrimony, and we are to take care of the whole family, the entire flock of children. The countries that, according to the theory here, ought to be in the penitentiary and locked up we are to establish mandatories over.

What is a mandatory? Let us get away from these new terms. A mandatory is a military occupation. It is an agreement that the United States will place an army in a country and hold it under the mailed heel of a war, and that we shall continue to occupy that country and to compel it to yield to our will, exactly as the Roman legions once camped upon a conquered country and Rome set up her imperial banners and her government.

A mandatory in Turkey means an army big enough to hold Turkey in subjection. A mandatory in any part of the world means that our men must make it an armed camp, and that our guns shall open their threatening mouths and shall be ready to speak annihilation of all whom we hold in subjection. That, sir, means the service of American boys.

Mandatories! A mandatory in Turkey means that we shall send, in my opinion, not less than half a million men there, perhaps a million, to hold the country in thrall; for, mark you, the Turks number 11,000,000 men, and, if I recollect correctly, they are about 5,000 miles from our coast. The Turk has been one of the best fighters in the world for the past 700 years, and an army of less than that I have named would be liable to annihilation at any time. Call it not mandatory; let us call it military occupancy.

Mr. President, let us go back. Let us trace the way we got into this war, the obligations we did assume, and also the statements that were made to the American people. It will take only a moment to lead up to the main point; but in order that I may do it consecutively, I call attention to a few dates.

August 2, 1914, war broke out in Europe between Germany and France. I believe it was a day or two later that Great Britain entered; but that is immaterial.

On August 4 Belgium was overrun by the advancing German Armies. The neutrality of Belgium was violated. The treaty that Germany had with Belgium, to which we were a party through The Hague convention, was treated as a scrap of paper; and yet, though that act had been done in the face of the world, on August 4, 1914, the President of the United States proclaimed the absolute neutrality of the United States.

On August 9 Liege was occupied, after the most terrific bombardment that had occurred in all the history of the world up to that time.

On August 14 the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] introduced a bill to prevent the shipment of arms or of provisions to the allied powers. I say allied powers; the bill was general in its nature, but at that time the only powers that could import food from the United States were the allied powers, for already the Navy of Great Britain had swept the seas clean of practically all German craft.

It is well to have these dates in mind. If that bill had passed it would not have been six months before England and France would have lain prostrate at the feet of Germany, for without American provisions and without American supplies France and England would have been overwhelmed by Germany. Every man knows that now. I do not challenge the good faith of the Senator from Nebraska when he introduced that bill. I do not charge him with pro-Germanism, a term that is too much bandied about the Senate, for every time a man indicates opposition to anything that is suggested from the White House somebody intimates pro-Germanism. But if that bill had passed, Germany would have dominated in Europe.

On the 19th day of August, after the German foot was on the neck of Belgium and Germany's sword was pressed to the Belgian heart, after the atrocities of which we have heard so much had been committed, after neutrality had been violated and treaties torn to shreds, after it was plain that Germany had entered upon her career of frightfulness, President Wilson, in an appeal to the American people for neutrality, stated:

> The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action; we must put a curb upon our sentiments as well as upon every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another.

The next day, on August 20, the German armies marched into Brussels. On August 24 Namur was taken. On August 26 Louvain was taken, and the French Army, driven back day after day, retreating, fighting gallantly, but carpeting all the soil with their glorious dead, were driven back in consternation and in defeat.

England was marshaling her little host of men and rushing them into the conflict. But during the early days of the war when Germany's purpose was plain, and when it was plain she intended to overwhelm the democracy of the world and establish the autocracy of force, while all that was going on we were pursuing a policy of being neutral in thought as well as in deed.

September 6 to September 10 were the four bloody days of the first battle of the Marne. The Germans reached the extreme point of their advance. With the French troops standing with their backs to the wall, the old French commander gave the word, "They shall not pass"; and so behind windrows of their own dead the French stood and died, and died, until at last they compelled the Germans to yield.

But the Germans did not go back to their own soil. Upon the secred lands of Belgium and of France they made their camps. They established their ground fortresses. Every trench bristled with guns, and they intended to hold this land of France and of Belgium. Their line was 300 miles long. And so they stayed, their clutch of steel upon the throat of France and of Belgium; and still we maintained our policy of neutrality in thought and in deed.

About that time a great American began to demand that the United States should enter the contest. He put his doctrine upon the ground that the treaties we had, The Hague convention and other treaties, had been in fact violated. I did not agree with him in his construction. I believed in the doctrine of neutrality. Yet I say, if we ever were to commit ourselves to the philosophy that it is our business to protect the world and to rescue the people of the world, then Theodore Roosevelt was right in what he said, and we should have acted then.

On May 7, 1915, the tragedy of history occurred, an event that was so black and so hellish that after its occurrence no man could doubt the cruel purpose of Germany. There she was, a floating palace, 700 feet long, her decks crowded with happy men and women, her steerage filled with returning emigrants, going back to their own shores. Little children were playing in the steerage and were hugged to the humble bosoms of their mothers with infinite love. On the upper decks ladies and gentlemen, with their families, were enjoying the glories of a May day. The bands were playing, and there was a song in every heart, for they were approaching their destination, and peace was about to come.

Off yonder under the waves lay the assassin of the sea in wait, and the German commander, with finger to the electric button, waited for the fateful moment when he could send into the bowels of that ship a deadly torpedo. He pressed it in obedience to the command of his Government, and into the ocean's gaping mouth went down this palace of the sea, and men and women, shrieking to God for mercy, and holding up their hands, went into the eternal silence and night of death, and mothers held up their babes, as they went down, that the little ones might have a last gasp of breath.

If we never knew before, we knew then that democracy was in peril. If we did not know it then, there was nothing that ever happened afterwards to show it to us. If it was our duty to interfere on behalf of the democracy of the world and the civilization of the world, those things that are rolled now in platitudinous volume from the lips of orators were then apparent to all the world. Yet, sir, we did not enter the contest. We maintained neutrality in thought and deed as nearly as we could. Although the American people were being killed in that way, yet we adhered to these policies.

What did our Government say? We sent this polite note to Germany:

> Recalling the humane and enlightened attitude hitherto assumed by the Imperial German Government in matters of international right, and particularly with regard to the freedom of the seas; having learned to recognize the German views and the German influence in the field of international obligation as always on the side of justice and humanity, the Government of the United States was loth to believe, it can not now bring itself to believe, that these acts, so absolutely contrary to the rules, practices, and the spirit of modern warfare, could have the countenance or sanction of that great Government.
> Long acquainted, as this Government has been, with the character of the Imperial German Government and with the high principles of equity by which they have in the past been actuated and guided, the Government of the United States can not believe that the commanders of the vessels which committed these acts of lawlessness did so except under a misapprehension of the orders issued by the Imperial German naval authorities.

Of course, that was the language of diplomacy, and I make all allowance for its politeness and moderation on that account. But we did assert to Germany then that she had violated the laws of the sea and in that violation many of our Americans had gone to their death, and Germany to this day never has disclaimed responsibility for that act.

On the same date that this message was sent to Germany the President, in an address to newly naturalized American citizens in Philadelphia, stated:

> The example of America must be a special example. The example of America must be the example of peace, not merely because it will not fight, but of peace because peace is the healing and the elevating influence of the world and strife is not. There is such a thing as a man being too proud to fight.

Yet in violation of our rights on the seas, on that same day the Lusitania had gone down into the waves forever, and American men and women had said good-by for the last time as the waves swallowed them up.

I do not say this in criticism. I believed then it was our duty, as I believe now it was our duty, to keep out of European quarrels if we could, and that much might be endured before we would thrust this country into war.

But, sir, if the doctrine that it was our business to enter to make the world safe for democracy; if the doctrine that it was our business to enter in order to set up new governments; if the doctrine that it was our business to establish in the world a new order of things is true to-day, it was just as true then, for Germany's fell purpose and hellish appetite was as well manifested then as it ever was. It was not our doctrine, as I shall show you. It was not the doctrine of the President.

On October 11, 1915, the war still going on, Germany not having disclaimed the Lusitania, in an address to the Daughters of the American Revolution, the President stated:

> America stands apart in its ideals; it ought not to allow itself to be drawn, as far as its heart is concerned, into anybody's quarrel.

And yet at that time the red flame of war was scorching all central Europe; at that time the same quarrel was on that we afterwards entered because of peculiar reasons applicable to ourselves.

I say again, if we entered the war for the purpose of reforming the world, changing the map, liberating people, defending democracy everywhere, setting up a new order of things, the necessity was as manifest then as it ever has been.

Now, Mr. President, in making a comparison, I may say I do it with utmost respect, both for the living and the dead, but in article after article former President Roosevelt had been insisting with a terrific power during all these months that it was the duty of the United States to enter this contest. I did not agree with him then; I do not agree now with his views; but it is important to state them, because, sir, I am going to read you what was, in fact, the President's reply to these oft-repeated demands.

In his annual message to Congress on December 7, 1915, the President said:

During these days of terrible war it would seem that every man who was truly an American would instinctively make it his duty and his pride to keep the scales of judgment even and prove himself a partisan of no nation but his own.

That was a sound American doctrine, according to my view; but it was brought out to meet the insistence of former President Roosevelt and other men who were adhering to his views.

Then, on January 31, 1916, in his speech at Milwaukee, the President said:

There is no precedent in American history for any action which might mean that America is seeking to connect herself with the controversies on the other side of the water. Men who seek to provoke such action have forgotten the traditions of the United States, but it behooves those you have intrusted with office to remember the traditions of the United States.

I want to read that again.

There is no precedent in American history for any action which might mean that America is seeking to connect herself with the controversies on the other side of the water. Men who seek to provoke such action have forgotten the traditions of the United States, but it behooves those you have intrusted with office to remember the traditions of the United States.

Sound doctrine then; sound doctrine now. American doctrine then; American doctrine now; the doctrine of Washington rejuvenated, if you please, and resanctified, and again uttered.

Again, on February 1, 1916, at Des Moines, Iowa, the President said:

There are actually men in America who are preaching war, who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before—seek entanglements in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water—abandon its habitual and traditional policy and deliberately engage in the conflict which is now enguifing the rest of the world. I do not know what the standard of citizenship of these gentlemen may be. I only know that I for one can not subscribe to those standards.

But, mark you, at that time we knew all of the sad events I have recited, and we knew that bloody battle after battle was going on. We knew all those stories of atrocity, whether true or false we do not know to-day, but we have read of the crucifixion of men; we knew that poison gas was being spewed out to eat the lungs of men; we knew that submarines had been sent forth to creep along the bottom of the ocean to blow up unsuspecting ships; we knew that execution after execution had occurred; we knew that cities had been sacked and that men and women had been stood up in line and shot because of their loyalty to their own country. At least all those stories were told to us. God knows, I hope, when the mists are cleared away, we shall find that many of them were untrue and that German character never sank to such a low estate. But this we know, that whatever causes there were to enter into the conflict in Europe for the purpose of preserving the democracy of the world, those causes were as apparent then as they were the last day of the war.

Not a new thing in Germany's policy developed, except what I shall refer to, when she undertook to extend her submarine warfare to the entire ocean.

Again, on February 2, 1916, in a speech at Kansas City, he said:

It would tear the heartstrings of America to be at war with any of the great nations of the world. We can show our friendship for the world and our devotion to the principles of humanity better and more effectively by keeping out of this struggle than by getting into it.

At the risk of wearying you—and yet nothing that the President has said could weary the Senate, I am sure, particularly the Senators on my side of the Chamber—I want to read it again.

On February 2, 1916, he said:

It would tear the heartstrings of America to be at war with any of the great nations of the world. We can show our friendship for the world and our devotion to the principles of humanity better and more effectively by keeping out of this struggle than by getting into it.

On February 24, 1916, in a letter to Senator Stone, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, my lamented colleague and friend, the President said:

You are right in assuming that I shall do everything in my power to keep the United States out of war. * * * I do not doubt that I shall continue to succeed.

And yet, I repeat, if the democracy of the world has ever been in danger that danger was manifest at that time. If it was ever our duty to interfere on that ground, the ground now alleged, the duty existed then.

On March 13, 1916, in an address to a delegation of Scandinavians at the White House, the President said:

I can assure you that nothing is nearer my heart than keeping this country out of the war.

On May 20, 1916, in an address at Charlotte, N. C., he said:

The European war * * * is a competition of foreign standards, of national traditions, and of national politics—political systems.

We did not hear anything then about making the world safe for democracy; we heard nothing then about civilization being at stake. We heard, on the contrary, that—

The European war is a competition of foreign standards, of national traditions, and of national politics—political systems.

On May 27, 1916, the President delivered an address before the League to Enforce Peace—Mr. Taft's league, now blossoming forth like the full-blown rose, and financed by the international banker whose vision is long enough to see across the Atlantic and to behold the golden harvest awaiting his financial sickle, and financed by them, according to a statement sent out by Mr. Taft's own league, the contents of which have been put in the RECORD. The genesis of that highly patriotic organization I shall give you in a little while from an address by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, who gave us its origin and its history and its inspiration in 1912, when he made a great speech in the Senate—a great American speech; but in his address to that organization the President declared:

The Great War that broke so suddenly upon the world two years ago, and which has swept within its flame so great a part of the civilized world, has affected us very profoundly, and we are not only at liberty, it is perhaps our duty, to speak very frankly of it and of the great interests of civilization which it affects.

With its causes and its objects we are not concerned. The obscure fountains from which its stupendous flood has burst forth we are not interested to search for or explore.

"With its causes and its objects we are not concerned." Why? Because we were following our traditional policy of allowing those nations to work out their own systems of government in their own way. But if we were ever to have entered this war for the purposes now proclaimed two years or three years after we entered it, those purposes were present then and we were interested in the causes and in the objects.

Again and only shortly after that—I believe it was about the 16th day of August—we held a Democratic convention, and the wonderful speech made by Gov. Glynn at that Democratic convention was submitted in advance and duly passed upon and approved. It is so fine a piece of oratory that I would be warranted in reading all of it, in putting it into the RECORD, and in taking the precious time of the Senate in doing so; but, briefly, he recited the history of this country from the first, adverted to every controversy of a national character we had had. He painted in the blackest characters the nature of the wrongs under which we had suffered, and after each picture was presented he always wound up with this sentence, "Did we fight? We did not. We negotiated."

After a résumé of all of these cases the governor, in impassioned declamation, proceeded to his argument. I shall not read it all, but I want to read a little of it:

If, in the great crisis that now confronts the Nation, the American people falter, if they forget that they are guardians of the most sacred trust that a people ever held, their apostasy will be visited upon the descendants of their children's children.

He was discussing an apostasy from the doctrines of Washington that we were to remain free from European disturbances. He continued:

Out of the flaming fire of revolution, out of a struggle in which they risked their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, the fathers of the Republic brought a Nation which they dedicated to liberty and to human progress.

For the Nation so consecrated true men in every generation have labored and struggled, suffered and died, that it might flourish and endure.

We who stand to-day on the fertile soil of America, who live under the smiling skies of a free and fruitful land, must prove worthy of the trust that American sacrifice has imposed on every American.

For the America of to-day and for the America of to-morrow, for the civilization of the present and for the civilization of the future, we must hold to the course that has made our Nation great; we must steer by the stars that guided our ship of state through the vicissitudes of a century.

For myself, I have confidence enough in my country, faith enough in my countrymen, to believe that the people of America will rise to their responsibilities with a single mind and a single voice.

What is this doctrine he is discussing? Follow me on through the lines that succeed:

One hundred and forty years ago the manhood of America was called upon to decide whether this should be a Nation. Half a century ago Americans were forced to determine whether this should continue to be a Nation. To-day the Republic faces a third crisis no less momentous than that of 1776 or that of 1860. To-day Americans must again determine whether their country shall preserve its national ideals, whether it shall have a national soul, whether it shall stand forth as a mighty and undivided force, whether the United States for which Washington fought and for which Lincoln died shall hold its place among the nations.

For two years the world has been afire; the civilization that we know has been torn by the mightiest struggle in its history. Sparks from Europe's conflagration have blazed in our own skies, echoes of her strife have sounded at our very doors. That fire still burns, that struggle still continues; but thus far the United States has held the flame at bay; thus far it has saved its people from participation in the conflict.

What the people of the United States must determine through their suffrage—

Now, he is stating the issue of the campaign—is whether the course the country has pursued through this crucial period is to be continued; whether the principles that have been asserted as our national policy shall be indorsed or withdrawn.

Whether, indeed, I interpolate, we were to continue to follow the policies of Washington or were to abandon them and to enter the European struggle. The orator continued:

This is a paramount issue. No lesser issue must cloud it; no unrelated problems must confuse it.

In the submission of this issue to the electorate—

"In the submission of this issue to the electorate"!

we of this convention hold these truths to be self-evident to every student of America's history, to every friend of America's institutions:

First. That the United States is constrained by the traditions of its past, by the logic of its present, and by the promise of its future, to hold itself apart from the European warfare, to save its citizens from participation in the conflict that now devastates the nations across the sea.

Yet, if we were ever to fight for democracy, the blow should have been struck long before that; if we were to fight for Europe and save Europe, the blow should have been struck long before that.

Second. That the United States in its relations with the European belligerents must continue the policy that it has pursued since the beginning of the war, the policy of strict neutrality in relation to every warring nation, the policy which Thomas Jefferson defined as "rendering to all the services and courtesies of friendship and praying for the reestablishment of peace and right.

Third. That save where the liberties, the territory, or the substantial rights of the United States are invaded and assaulted, it is the duty of this Nation to avoid war by every honorable means.

And it was the violation of that third provision which afterwards brought us into the war and furnished the only just cause for our entering the war. But let us see how this doctrine comports with the modern doctrine that it is our business to stay in Europe, Asia, and Africa and govern the world and, with our armies and our navies, force our will, either our joint or our several wills, upon all men and women on this earth.

Fourth. That is is the duty of the United States Government to maintain the dignity and the honor of the American Nation and in every situation demand and secure from every belligerent the recognition of the neutral rights of its citizens.

Fifth. That because the President of the United States has asserted these principles and pursued these policies the American people must support him with ardor and enthusiasm, in order that these principles and policies may be known to all the world not as the opinion of an individual but as the doctrine and faith of a loyal and united Nation.

And then, to prove that the President was right, he proceeded:

In emphasis of these self-evident propositions we assert that the policy of neutrality is as truly American as the American flag.

Oh, what is this new doctrine that there are to be no neutrals, for that is what the President said; that in all the wars that may devastate the world hereafter there is never to be another neutral; that all nations are to be concerned? Yet the doctrine of neutrality in the early days of August, 1916, was as much American as the American flag, according to the sponsor and nominator of our candidate for President.

He continued:

For 200 years neutrality was a theory; America made it a fact.

The first President of the United States was the first man to pronounce neutrality a rule of international conduct.

In April, 1793, Washington declared the doctrine; and within a month John Jay, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in an epoch-making decision from the bench, whose realization would insure universal and perpetual peace, wrote the principle into the law of this land. The Declaration of Independence had foretold it by declaring "the rest of mankind enemies in war, in peace friends"; the Constitution recognized it; but the first President of the United States by proclamation, the first Chief Justice by interpretation, gave it vitality and power.

And so neutrality is American in its initiation.

But now there are to be no more neutrals. We are to sign away the birthright that Washington bequeathed us, and for the doctrine of neutrality substitute the doctrine that there shall be no more neutrals in this world; and if you do not do it you are cowards, according to the polite language of the advocates of this doctrine of peace. Truly, they employ fighting language in the advocacy of the dovecote and the proclamation of its sweet cooings.

Thirty years later—

Said this orator—

Prime Minister Canning, in the British Parliament, pointed to this American policy of neutrality as a model for the world; and 80 years later, after approval by various statutes and agreements, it was written, almost word for word, in the treaty wherewith we settled our differences with England over violations of neutrality throughout the Civil War.

And so neutrality is American in its consummation.

And to-day in this hall, so that all the world may hear, we proclaim that this American policy of neutrality is the policy which the present administration pursues with patriotic zeal and religious devotion; while Europe's skies blaze red from fires of war, Europe's soil turns red from blood of men, Europe's eyes see red from tears of mourning women and from sobs of starving children.

The men who say this policy is not American can appeal to passion and to prejudice and ignore the facts of history.

Neutrality is America's contribution to the laws of the world. Sir Henry Maine says so, Charles Francis Adams says so, Henry Clay says so, Daniel Webster says so, and upon the evidence of these witnesses we rest our Americanism against the sputterings of pepper-pot politicians or the fabrications of those with whom a false issue is a good issue until its falsity is shown, its maliciousness exposed.

This was his answer to those who were then clamoring that the democracy of the world and the civilization of the earth were at issue in Europe. The answer was, neutrality; stand upon the solid ground that Washington told us to stand upon, namely, the soil of America.

To win this priceless right of neutrality this Nation had to undergo a long and painful struggle.

It took Washington with his allies and sword eight years to win recognition of his country's liberty; it took Washington and his successors 80 years of endless negotiation to win recognition of American neutrality. And this 80 years of struggle wove the doctrine of neutrality so closely into the warp and woof of our national life that to tear it out now would unravel the very threads of our existence.

That is exactly what you are trying to do here to-day. That is what this treaty does. It tears the threads out of the warp and woof of the national life and threatens our very existence.

He continued, but he was not a prophet:

Where is the American hardy enough to challenge a policy so firmly fixed in the Nation's traditions?

Behold all these! He did not reckon on their courage, their sublime disregard alike of danger, of law, of Constitution, and of tradition.

Is there among us any man bold enough to set his wisdom above that of Washington?

Not then, but shortly they came forth, a well-hatched group, almost as numerous as the partisan whip could herd together within the confines of the country.

Is there among us any man bold enough to set his wisdom above that of Washington?

You have been told in this Chamber that Washington is a back number; that he has been dead a long while; yet I say, sirs, that a thousand years from this day, if civilization still lives and men love the name of liberty, the hand of patriotism will pluck the blossoms from the tomb of Washington and press them lovingly as a memento of the immortal one.

Is there among us any man bold enough to set his wisdom above that of Washington, his patriotism above that of Hamilton, and his Americanism above that of Jefferson? Is there any American so blind to our past, so hostile to our future that, departing from our policy of neutrality, he would hurl us headlong into the maelstrom of the war across the sea?

The President of the United States stands to-day where stood the men who made America and who saved America.

He stands where John Adams stood when he told King George that America was the land he loved and that peace was her grandeur and her welfare. He stands where Gen. Grant stood when he said there never was a war that could not have been settled better some other way, and he has shown his willingness to try the ways of peace before he seeks the paths of war.

He stands where George Washington stood when he prayed that this country would never unsheath the sword except in self-defense so long as justice and our essential rights could be preserved without it.

Self-defense, not the defense of Czechoslovakia, not the defense of Poland, not the defense of Japanese territory, not the defense of British possessions that in splotches of red obscure one-third of the map of the Eastern Hemisphere that hangs upon this wall, but self-defense of this country; our own defense.

For vainglory or for selfish purpose others may cry up a policy of blood and iron, but the President of the United States has acted on the belief that the leader of a nation who plunges his people into an unnecessary war, like Pontius Pilate vainly washes his hands of innocent blood while the earth quakes and thousands give up the ghost.

Only by standing on this rock of Americanism—

I am reading from a Democratic campaign book, and see how large they printed these letters:

Only by standing on this rock of Americanism against which dashed the waves of conflict could the President of the United States, faced by a world in arms, save this country from being drawn into the whirlpool of disaster. One false step in any direction and he would have carried the Nation with him over the precipice.

By opposing what we stand for to-day the Republican Party opposes what Hamilton stood for a century ago.

Now, you Republicans over there can answer whether you stood for it, whether this is a just indictment or not. It is none of my business to defend you. I know this is what we said when we went to the American people to get votes, when we appealed to their hearts and to their consciences.

The founder of the Republican Party and the founder of the Democratic Party, placing their country's happiness above every other consideration, forgot partisanship and made American neutrality a national creed. We who follow Jefferson stand where Jefferson stood, but we look in vain for a sign from the present leaders of the Republican Party to show that they follow where Hamilton led.

Where Hamilton thought only of country, they thought only of self. Where Hamilton placed patriotism above partisanship, they placed partisanship above patriotism. How long do they dare to speak for the great body of American citizens who form the rank and file of the Republican Party? Do these leaders believe that their Republicanism is a better Republicanism than Hamilton's, their Americanism a purer Americanism than that of Washington?

Unless statesmanship has fallen into disrepute among Republicans, the men who controlled the Chicago convention can not read Alexander Hamilton out of the Republican Party. Unless I mistake the temper of the American people the Republican bosses can no more lead their adherents away from the neutrality for which Washington and Hamilton struggled than they can lead them away from the flag for which Washington and Hamilton fought.

Then comes the headline "Inconsistency Laid Bare."

If Washington was right, if Jefferson was right, if Hamilton was right, if Lincoln was right, then the President of the United States is right to-day; if the Republican leaders are right then Lincoln was wrong and Jefferson was wrong and Hamilton was wrong and Washington was wrong.

In all the history of the world there is no other national policy that has justified itself so completely.

Now, get this, Democrats:

In all the history of the world there is no other national policy that has justified itself so completely and entirely as the American policy of neutrality and isolation from the quarrels of European powers.

Of course, that was true in August, 1916.

Mr. GORE. June.

Mr. REED. That is the date I have. Was it June?

Mr. GORE. The convention was in June.

Mr. REED. Then it was in June. I was at the convention, and I heard the speech, one of the most remarkable speeches I have ever heard, one of the greatest ones. He continues:

Before we declared our neutrality we were embroiled in all the troubles of Great Britain, France, and Spain; since then we have had less than three years of war with Europe and 116 years of amity and peace.

But now we are entering upon a new policy, where we can have 116 years of war as against a possible 3 years of amity and peace, for now we embroil ourselves in all the quarrels of Europe. There are 23 wars going on there now, and there have been fought in Europe in the last 105 years over 106 wars, 50 of them being great wars. And we had only 3 years of war in all that time, according to this orator.

Mr. THOMAS. That leaves out the Civil War.

Mr. REED. We do not count our own domestic war, which we had under a league of States, composed of one people, living under one law, with one religion, and yet it did not prevent the only great war we ever had. He continues:

Before this declaration every war was a world war—

That is, before our declaration made by Washington.

Before this declaration war was a whirlpool ever increasing in area and in its whirl dragging down the nations of the earth; since this declaration war has become a sea of trouble upon which nations embark only from self-will, from self-interest, or the necessity of geographical position, of financial obligation, or political alliance.

Ah, let me call your attention to the great truth there uttered. Before the doctrine of neutrality, says this author, was established by Washington we were embroiled in the wars of every nation, but the result of it was the circumscribing of war, delimiting it to particular nations through 116 years it had gone on. Now we propose to abandon neutrality; aye, more, to make an absolute contract to become participants in the war, and to thus throw ourselves into this maelstrom; aye, help to create it. Is it not enough to alarm every American? Is it not enough to open even the dull ears of the adder, that has closed her ears that she may not hear? This continues:

Neutrality is the policy which has kept us at peace while Europe has been driving the nails of war through the hands and feet of a crucified humanity.

Now we propose to enter the European struggle.

It has banished conquest from our program of national greatness. It has made us find our destiny at home.

It has forced us to build on the brawn of our sons and the energy of our daughters rather than upon the tears of conquered women and the blood of conquered men. It has made us seek treasure in our harvests, wealth in our fields by staying our hands from war's blood-stained pot of gold. It has been the flaming sword which forbade us to devastate the Eden of others and compelled us to make an Eden of our own. It has freed us from the paralyzing touch of Europe's power, leaving to Europe the things that are Europe's and preserving for America the independence, the peace, and the happiness that now are hers.

As a result of this policy America stands serene and confident, mighty and proud, a symbol of peace and liberty in a world aflame, a sanctuary where the lamp of civilization burns clear and strong, a living, breathing monument to the statesmanship of the great Americans who kept it free from the menace of European war.

But now we must mix in all their wars, defend all these countries, and we are quibbling about whether we are going to do it jointly or severally.

Wealth has come to us, power has come to us, but better than wealth or power we have maintained for ourselves and for our children a Nation dedicated to the ideals of peace rather than to the gospel of selfishness and slaughter.

But, say our critics, this policy satisfies no one.

This is where the Republicans come in for their share.

They mean it does not satisfy those who would map out a new and untried course for this Nation to pursue, but they forget it does satisfy those who believe the United States should live up to the principles it has professed for a century and more.

Chief Justice White of the United States Supreme Court says this policy has given America the greatest diplomatic victory of the past generation. Maximilian Harden, Germany's noted editor, says "that never once has this Republic violated its neutrality"; and Gilbert K. Chesterton, the famous English journalist, says "it is the duty of the President of the United States to protect the interests of the people of the United States"; that "he can not dip his country into hell just to show the world he has a keen sense of being an individual savior."

Splendid doctrine; but are we now about to dip our country into this hell spoken of by this writer, that we may succor others?

This policy may not satisfy those who revel in destruction and find pleasure in despair. It may not satisfy the fire-eater or the swashbuckler, but it does satisfy those who worship at the altar of the god of peace.

The god of peace seems to have moved his altar and changed his doctrine, or written a new creed, if these be true priests serving at the altar, who now would reverse our theories, change our policies, and embark us upon a career of internationalism and of nonneutrality. He continues:

It does satisfy the mothers of the land at whose hearth and fireside no jingoistic war has placed an empty chair. It does satisfy the daughters of this land from whom bluster and brag has sent no loving brother to the dissolution of the grave. It does satisfy the fathers of this land and the sons of this land who will fight for our flag and die for our flag when reason primes the rifle, when honor draws the sword, when justice breathes a blessing on the standards they uphold.

That sounds to me like old-fashioned Americanism. I can see the flash of fire from the old flintlock rifles of the Revolution as I read those words. I can hear the rattle of the sabers of Washington's men as I read those words. It is the soul of the past speaking through the lips of a great orator of the present, one to inspire and to lead us on. This speech won the election. He continues:

And whom, we ask, will the policy of our opponents satisfy, and for how long?

Get this, O ye of little faith, or, rather, ye with faith so great that every vision that comes out of the sky and every voice that comes from the air is to you a vision of heaven and the voice of God.

And whom, we ask, will the policy of our opponents satisfy, and for how long? Fighting for every degree of injury would mean perpetual war, and this is the policy of our opponents, deny it how they will. It would not allow the United States to keep the sword out of the scabbard as long as there remains an unrighted wrong or an unsatisfied hope between the snowy wastes of Siberia and the jungled hills of Borneo.

That is the best picture of the league of nations ever drawn. It was painted before the league was conceived, and it may have been the inspiration of the league—who knows? For, God wot, where else would it come from?

It would make America as dangerous to itself and to others, as destructive and as uncontrollable as the cannon that slipped its moorings in Victor Hugo's tale of '93. It would give us a war abroad each time the fighting cock of the European weather vane shifted with the breeze. It would make America the cockpit of the world.

I do not like to interrupt this wonderful piece of eloquence, but I do it, and I read again:

It would give us a war abroad each time the fighting cock of the European weather vane shifted with the breeze.

And up in Russia, among a people that were late our allies and who left 6,000,000 of their dead upon the field fighting in the cause, as we now say, of democracy, we have our troops but recently serving because the weather cock of war has turned in a certain direction. Again we are sending them over to Silesia, and again we are binding ourselves by this document to keep them for 15 years in the Saar Valley.

But I continue:

It would make America the cockpit of the world. It would mean the reversal of our traditional policy of government. It would mean the adoption of imperialistic doctrines which we have denounced for over a century. It would make all the other nations the wards of the United States and the United States the keeper of the world.

He was mistaken. It makes all the nations of the world the wards of Great Britain and Great Britain the keeper of the world, with the United States, like one of her colonies, enjoying a single vote.

He continues:

What would become of the keeper of the world?

Now we and Great Britain stand side by side as keepers of the world—no; not side by side. We are to stand just in the rear of Great Britain, and side by side with Japan. Let me read these words:

What would become of the keeper of the world? What would become of the Monroe doctrine under such a policy? How long do our opponents suppose we would be allowed to meddle in European affairs while denying Europe the right to meddle in American affairs?

Get that, you Democrats who went to that convention and shouted until you nearly burst your blood vessels. Get it, those of you who went upon the stump in your various States and called your people to rally to the Democratic banner. Get it, all ye leaders in the hosts of democracy who returned from that convention having renewed the fires of your own hearts by coals taken hot from the altar of that great Democratic temple.

What would become of the Monroe doctrine under such a policy? How long do our opponents suppose we would be allowed to meddle in European affairs while denying Europe the right to meddle in American affairs? The policy of our opponents is a dream—

A dream that, having been interpreted, has now become the theme of statemen—a dream that, it seemed, would be blessed of partisanship, lose all the hideous characteristics of the theme, and all the habiliments and all the lineaments of statesmen, now took on the transfiguration of life and angelic purity.

The policy of our opponents is a dream. It never could be a possibility. It is not even advanced in good faith. It is simply an appeal to passion and pride, to sympathy and prejudice, to secure partisan advantage. In a word, this policy of our opponents would make the United States the policeman of the world.

And to-day the tailors of the Senate are laying out the cloth and cutting the uniforms for the policemen.

Rome tried to be policeman of the world, and went down. Portugal tried to be policeman of the world, and went down. Spain tried, and went down; and the United States proposes to profit by the experience of the ages and avoid ambitions whose reward is sorrow and whose crown is death.

Great applause, led by distinguished Senators.

Then follows a headline, "Woodrow Wilson, the Man."

Americanism and peace, preparedness and prosperity—these are the issues upon which the Democratic Party stands, and the heart of democracy swells with pride that is more than a pride of party, as it hails the man who has asserted this Americanism, assured this peace, advocated this preparedness, and produced this prosperity.

The man who is President of the United States to-day has measured up to the best traditions of a great office.

He has been wise with a wisdom that is steeped in the traditions of his country, with a wisdom that has been disciplined by training and broadened by instruction.

He has been prudent with the prudence of one who has within his hands the destiny of a hundred million people.

He has been firm with the firmness that proceeds from deep conviction, with the firmness that is grounded in a duty well defined.

He has been courageous with the courage that places country above self, with the courage that follows duty wherever it may lead.

He has been dignified with the dignity that is self-forgetting and self-respecting, with the dignity that conserves the majesty of the greatest office in the world.

He has been patient with the patience which believes and trusts that "truth crushed to earth will rise again," with the patience that can endure and wait, watch and pray, for the certain vindication of justice, humanity, and right.

He has been patriotic with a patriotism that has never wavered, a patriotism that is as pure and strong as the faith that moved the fathers when they made our country free.

No President since the Civil War has had as crucial problems to solve, and no President has displayed a grasp more sure, a statesmanship more profound.

Assailed by the wolves of privilege, he has pulled their claws and drawn their teeth.

Assaulted by partisan envy he has shamed his traducers into silence and made friend and foe go forward together in the paths of national progress.

He has fired our patriotism with a new ardor; he has breathed into our ancient traditions a new vigor and a new life.

He has added strength to America's courage and mingled mercy with America's strength.

He has fastened the brakes of justice upon the wheels of power; he has lifted the mists from the temple where our liberties are enshrined.

President and President to be, when the history of these days comes to be written and the children of to-morrow read their Nation's story, when time shall have dispelled all misconception and the years shall have rendered their impartial verdict, one name will shine in golden splendor upon the page that is blackened with the tale of Europe's war, one name will represent the triumph of American principles over the hosts of darkness and of death.

That name will be the name of the Great President who has made Democracy proud that he is a Democrat and made Americans proud that he is an American.

It will be the name of the student and the scholar who has kept his country true to its faith in a time that tried men's souls; the name of the statesman who has championed the cause of American freedom wherever he found it oppressed; the name of the patriot who has implanted his country's flag on the highest peak to which humanity has yet aspired; the name that carried the torch of progress to victory once and will carry it to victory again; the name of Woodrow Wilson, President and President to be.

Mr. President, that was the battle cry of the campaign. It left the question open if our rights were attacked that we could defend them, but if peace can bless a party and if utterance can bind men, that bound us to sustain the doctrine of Washington, the traditional doctrine of our country, to maintain the dignity of our own land, to keep free from entanglements with Europe, to keep free from the European war unless we were assailed, and then to defend our own rights and seek nothing further than the defense of our rights. It gives the repudiation, I had almost said the lie, to every argument I have heard in favor of the league of nations.

Mr. President, it is impossible for me to finish my remarks to-night. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] if he will not move a recess, or I will yield to anyone who desires to take the floor.

THE SILVER DOLLAR.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I want to speak very briefly of an event of great interest and greater importance to this great country.

This is the anniversary of the armistice. It will be known to history as the dawn of the new silver jubilee, for silver yesterday was quoted at a price per ounce in the market in excess of $1.2929, the historic ratio of 16 to 1. During the early months of the war the Senator from Utah and myself in discussing its probable effect upon the white metal ventured a prediction of the coming of this identical accomplishment. Silver is worth in the market at the last quotation $1.3025, or about 15½ to 1 with gold; and to-day gold is the cheaper metal of the two. The gold dollar is the short-legged dollar of the time, and the despised metal has come into its own.

I have a clipping from the New York Tribune relating to the subject which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD. I shall not detain the Senate at this time by any further comment upon this really epochal fact—a fact which must profoundly affect the finances of the world and lead the nations back to the bimetallic standard which they unwisely abandoned 40 or 50 years ago. I shall take occasion at some more favorable time to address the Senate upon the need for utilizing this fortunate situation for the permanent equalization of exchange between these two historic money metals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Colorado is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SILVER DOLLAR IS WORTH MORE THAN $1 NOW—RISE IN PRICE OF METAL GIVES UNITED STATES COIN HIGHER VALUE AS BULLION THAN ITS FACE VALUE AS MONEY.

"For the first time in 35 years the metal in the American silver dollar is worth more than the face value of the coin.

"Sales of the metal were made in the New York market yesterday at $1.30½ an ounce. The gold parity of the silver dollar is $1.2929; that is, when silver metal sells at that price the silver in the dollar is worth a dollar.

"With silver selling around the high price established yesterday, it will be profitable to melt down dollars and sell them as bullion. Bullion dealers estimated the melting cost at about half a cent an ounce. 'Goulashing' of dollars, as the bullion trade calls melting them down, is not likely to become much of a practice, however, because of the limited number of dollars in circulation. Upward of $200,000,000 worth of silver dollars were melted down and sold as bullion under the provisions of the war-time Pittman Act. Much of that silver went to India to pay for war purchases.

PRICE RISING SINCE WAR STARTED.

"Silver, like most other commodities, has been steadily rising in price since the war began, and the movement has been accelerated since the signing of the armistice by reason of the heavy world demand for the metal for coinage. With the withdrawal of gold from circulation in various parts of the world, as a result of the war, silver has come into greater use, particularly in Europe, where it has temporarily taken the place of gold as hard money.

"Since last May, when the United States lifted the embargo upon exports of silver from the country, China has come into this market as a heavy purchaser, and recently sales for shipment to the Far East have been running at the rate of 7,000,000 to 10,000,000 ounces a month. In August exports to China reached the larger figure, and in September they exceeded 7,000,000 ounces. China is bidding against the world for silver at present, and is willing to pay a higher price than England. That is the principal factor in the market at the moment, and the demand from that quarter is expected to continue heavy for some time.

HIGHEST PRICE SINCE 1859.

"Meanwhile the London price has steadily mounted. Yesterday the official quotation there was 68¾ pence per ounce, the equivalent of $1.27 in this market. This is the highest London quotation since 1859, when silver rose in spectacular fashion following the Crimean War and the Indian mutiny.

"The available supply of silver in the London market is said to be the lowest in years. London normally carries between 8,000,000 and 10,000,000 ounces on hand. Owing to the diversion of shipments to China in recent months and the holding up of trans-Atlantic shipments by reason of the longshoremen's strike here, the London supply has dwindled to less than a million ounces. At the present quotation for silver in London, the English shilling can be melted down profitably for its bullion value. The British treasury last week placed an embargo upon the export of silver to protect its silver currency, and the French Government has done likewise.

"The sensational rise in silver has carried the value of the lowly Mexican dollar or peso to 99 cents, which was the market quotation yesterday. The face value of the coin is just under 50 cents, but high silver has made it worth nearly twice as much for its silver content."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has just suspended a very brilliant speech set throughout with gems of invective, satire, and irony. In a forum of this character that method of argument is not appealing and should not be effective. The gist and substance of the argument of the Senator from Missouri is that, notwithstanding the incidents which attended our entry into the war, our sacrifices in the war, our association with our allies in a struggle to save civilization, now that the war has successfully terminated it is our duty to absolve this Government from any attempt to prevent the recurrence of such a war as that which has just ended.

The Senator from Missouri during the course of his remarks has made some statements which I feel it my duty in fairness to my colleagues, and particularly in justice to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], to controvert. All Senators will recall that the Senator from Missouri ridiculed the address made on yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska and declared that Senator had asserted that the obligation of the United States to protect the feeble nations of Europe which had obtained their freedom during the war arises because of a declaration to that effect by Mr. Root and, perhaps, by Mr. Hughes. The Senator from Missouri declared that the Senator from Nebraska repeated that assertion four times in his address of yesterday.

Mr. President, I heard every word of the very able speech made by the Senator from Nebraska, and I have taken the trouble to read it since the Senator from Missouri made that statement. I challenge the accuracy of his statement. I can not comprehend how any Senator with the intelligence which I know the Senator from Missouri possesses could have made the statement in view of the actual declaration made by the Senator from Nebraska; but the Senator from Missouri did make that statement.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the inaccuracy of the statement made by the Senator from Missouri in his bitter criticism of his colleague, the Senator from Nebraska, I am going to read what the Senator from Nebraska did say, and then leave it to fair-minded persons to determine whether the criticism which the Senator from Missouri so sarcastically heaped upon him is justified in this presence. The Senator from Nebraska was answering questions by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who said:

> I was astounded to hear from so able a Senator as the representative of the minority in this contest the statement that we had assumed an obligation. How have we assumed it? Who committed us? By what authority?
> Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator himself, for one.
> Mr. PENROSE. In what way?
> Mr. HITCHCOCK. By voting for the Army bill, for instance, in which we organized the Slavic legion, in which we invited the Slavs of the United States to volunteer, although they were technically citizens of Austria, to serve in our Army and go across the ocean and fight against the nation to which they owed allegiance, in the hope that they would assist us in defeating Austria. We assumed that obligation when we encouraged the Poles to throw off their allegiance. We assumed that obligation when we encouraged the Bohemians, technically known as Jugo-Slavs, to throw off their allegiance to Austria.
> This Nation went as far as it could in inviting those subject peoples to rebel, and why? Because in speeches here upon the floor of the Senate and upon the floor of the House of Representatives and elsewhere in the country representative citizens proclaimed that if the United States and her associates were successful in the war the old nation of Poland should be revived, and Bohemia should become a nation in the world, and the Jugo-Slavs should be permitted to organize their nation. We were committed morally to those subject peoples. We encouraged them to struggle, and we practically guaranteed them that we and our associate nations would stand by them in guaranteeing their independence.

That is the statement which the Senator from Nebraska made on yesterday as to our obligation already assumed. It was based upon the events of history; it was justified by the course of events, which no individual, whether he be President or a Member of the Senate or a private citizen, could stay.

The reference to Mr. Hughes and Mr. Root which the Senator from Nebraska made was in the following language:

> Many public men, notably former Senator Root, and, I believe, also Mr. Hughes, have taken the position that at least for five years we ought to stand by the moral obligations we assumed.

The Senator from Nebraska did not say that this declaration which I have just quoted from these gentlemen constituted an obligation. He merely stated that these great American citizens had recognized the obligation.

Further on in his address the Senator from Nebraska made another reference to former Senator Root. He was asked a question concerning our duty to Korea and whether we had violated our treaty with the Korean people, and he replied as follows:

> I think under the treaty of 1848 we were bound to Korea, but when Korea appealed to us under that treaty we repudiated it. That, however, is no reason why we should repudiate the moral obligation we have undertaken to the little nations of Europe. Think of the effect in those countries of the announcement that the United States assumes no obligation for their protection! Ex-Senator Root said we should assume that obligation for at least five years.

Mr. President, with respect to the correctness of the attitude of the Senator from Nebraska when he declared that by reason of having organized these nations and encouraged them to struggle for their independence, by reason of having made their cause our cause, and having assisted them in achieving their independence we owe them the obligation not to leave them at the mercy of their former enemies—if that is contrary to the doctrines and precedents which the Senator from Missouri would cite, very well and good, but it is justified by a higher authority in this Chamber. If the Senator from Nebraska had desired to restate an argument made by a great Senator in his presence on December 21, 1918, he could have hardly done so more effectively than was accomplished in the language that he used. The leader of the majority, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], on yesterday declared that the purpose of the pending reservation is to nullify article 10. He said:

> I think the people of the country understand very well what this reservation means, that it disposes of article 10 so far as we are concerned, and effectively disposes of it.
> Mr. President, I have proceeded in all I have tried to do on the simple theory of clearing the United States, so far as possible, from obligations imposed by the league in which I do not wish to see the United States involved. Every country can take care of itself, and I have never thought it was our duty to look after them.

If that statement stood alone, Mr. President, I could not consistently quote the Senator from Massachusetts as advocating the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska during yesterday's debate; but I recur now to a great speech made by the Senator from Massachusetts, delivered in the Senate on Saturday, December 21, 1918, a carefully prepared address. In that speech, notwithstanding the Senator from Missouri has so forcefully and repeatedly ridiculed the declaration that the United States went to war to save civilization, the Senator from Massachusetts made that identical declaration. The Senator from Massachusetts then said:

> We went to war to save civilization. For this mighty purpose we have sacrificed thousands of American lives and spent billions of American treasure. We can not, therefore, leave the work half done. We are as much bound, not merely by interest and every consideration for a safe future but by honor and self-respect, to see that the terms of peace are carried out as we were to fulfill our great determination that the armies of Germany should be defeated in the field. We can not halt or turn back now. We must do our share to carry out the peace as we have done our share to win the war, of which the peace is an integral part. We must do our share in the occupation of German territory which will be held as security for the indemnities to be paid by Germany. We can not escape doing our part in aiding the peoples to whom we have helped to give freedom and independence in establishing themselves with ordered governments, for in no other way can we erect the barriers which are essential to prevent another outbreak by Germany upon the world. We can not leave the Jugo-Slavs, the Czecho-Slovaks, and the Poles, the Lithuanians, and the other States which we hope to see formed and marching upon the path of progress and development unaided and alone.

Mr. President, that is the statement made in December of 1918 by the Senator from Massachusetts. On yesterday, however, with a peculiar emphasis, he declared that he had never had any purpose such as expressed in his speech that I have just read. He declared that he had never had any thought that it was our duty to look after these feeble nations; but, in language which burns itself into the brain, in the speech that I have quoted from, delivered in December, 1918, the Senator from Massachusetts made in substance the identical argument which was made on yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska.

The Senator from Missouri, during the course of his remarks, declared that if anything emanated from the White House, and if any Senator suggested oppositon to it, some Senators—making a broad wave of his hand toward this side of the Chamber—immediately proclaimed the opposition pro-Germanism. I have quoted his language almost exactly. Mr. President, if I were disposed to reply in kind to the Senator from Missouri, I might say that when anything emanates from the White House, some Senators immediately take the rabies and throw a fit; but that character of argument, Mr. President, is not justified here.

The President of the United States has had the greatest responsibility during the last few years that ever fell upon the shoulders of any mortal being. He has discharged the functions of his office, according to my honest conviction, fearlessly and with due regard to the rights of our citizens and of all mankind. He negotiated a treaty of peace as the representative of this Government. It is not generous, it is not kind—to use the language of the Senator from Missouri, so often repeated by him in the course of these debates—for my friend the Senator from Missouri to declare that in undertaking to ratify this treaty, which we believe representative of the best that could be obtained in the conference, which we believe is calculated to safeguard the interest of the world and the interests of the United States—it is not fair to declare, as the Senator from Missouri did declare during his address, that we disregard the Constitution and the laws of our country.

The Senator from Missouri has consumed more than an hour of the time of the Senate this evening in reading an address delivered before the Democratic National Convention in June, 1916. The address is an excellent one. It is true that the address was well received by the people of the United States. It proclaimed an obligation upon the United States to continue the practice of neutrality.

Did the Senator from Missouri, when he refers to his colleagues on this side of the Chamber as having "shouted until we almost burst our blood vessels" at the delivery of that address, protest against it? Did he approve it?

Mr. REED. Certainly I approved it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator says, "Certainly I approved it." Then why does he condemn his colleagues for approving it?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator addresses that interrogation to me, I do not condemn them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to go on.

Mr. REED. Oh, proceed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think I can state the reason.

Mr. REED. Proceed.

Mr. ROBINSON. The whole course of the Senator's argument was to the effect that the doctrine of neutrality was the right doctrine, and that the United States ought to have stayed out of the war.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I did not say that. The Senator can not make me say that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not say the Senator said it. I said that was the whole course and effect of his argument.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? The Senator does not want to put me in a wrong position, I know.

Mr. ROBINSON. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator; certainly.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not want to put me in any wrong position before the country. The text of my speech will go into the RECORD without any correction from me.

Mr. ROBINSON. I know so.

Mr. REED. And the Senator will find, if he reads it, that I repeatedly said that the cause afterwards came, in substance and effect. My address was leading up to that cause, and it will be fully covered to-morrow. Now, all I am particular about is that the Senator shall not put me before the country as saying that we should not have gone into this war, for I voted for this war and I supported it.

That is all I wish to say.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the statement which the Senator now makes is not in line with the statement which he made during the course of his remarks.

Mr. REED. Well, the RECORD will show.

Mr. ROBINSON. I can show the Senator himself, if he will just give me an opportunity.

Mr. REED. Go ahead.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator may regard himself as incapable of committing error; he may think that his colleagues are always mistaken when they differ from him; but, as I have the floor now, I am certainly entitled to the privilege of showing that he is wrong, if I can show it.

The Senator read incident after incident in which Germany trespassed upon the rights of civilization and upon the rights of citizens of the United States. In language which burned itself into the memory of every man, woman, and child in this assembly, the Senator from Missouri described the Lusitania incident. He told of fathers and mothers, many of them American citizens, on that great vessel, and of the secret blow which the German submarine struck against that vessel and sent it to the bottom. He pictured the misery and the desolation that resulted from that act, and he said that if ever we were going to war we ought to have gone to war then. That statement was repeated in connection with many other incidents. He declared, Mr. President, that former President Roosevelt had said that we ought to abandon a position of neutrality; that while he did not agree with him, he asserted that the only justification of our entering the war was a subsequent violation of our rights; but, Mr. President, the whole course of his argument was to the effect that from the beginning of the war Germany had been disregarding our rights, and that we ought to have entered the war, if we were going to, sooner than we did enter it, in the interest of civilization.

Does the Senator from Missouri now believe that the sole motive for which the United States entered the war was to avenge some illegal act of the German Government against this Government or its citizens? Does the Senator from Missouri insist that the only justification for our entering the war was the unlawful acts of Germany against this Government? If he does, he contradicts the speech made by the Senator from Massachusetts, one of the very best speeches that very able Senator has ever made. If he insists that the only motive that inspired this Nation in going to war was to avenge illegal acts committed against our Government or its citizens by Germany after the events which he so eloquently described, then, Mr. President, I want him to say what the acts were.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. REED. I take it the Senator meant to be interrupted when he asked that question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Very briefly, allow me to state—and the RECORD will show that what I say is correct—that I continually repeated that if the cause for our entering the war was that we were going in to save the world that cause existed long before we went into the war, and I related these incidents.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, will the Senator permit me right there? If the Senator is saying now that the real and only cause of our entering the war was the transgression of American rights by Germany, I reply to him, in his language, that those causes existed long before we entered the war.

Mr. REED. That was the statement I made, as I was leading up to what I intend to say to-morrow, that the additional cause came. Now, I am perfectly frank with the Senator when I say that I have not any doubt that all these atrocities and wrongs which had been heaped upon America before had their cumulative effect, but that when we did go into the war we went into the war because of the act of Germany in renewing her submarine warfare, and in sinking American vessels. That is the line of argument; and the Senator is not quoting me correctly when he states, as I think he did state, that I argued that these causes for war existed before. I said that if we were going in to save the world, those things were apparent to all. My argument is that we finally, after having stood them, reached the point where Germany broke faith with us, repudiated an agreement she had made with us, declared she was going to embark upon unrestricted submarine warfare, and practically warned us off the seas. Even then, we did not go to war. We waited until Germany sank three of our vessels, and then we declared that a state of war existed.

That is the statement I made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is undoubtedly true, as stated, that the United States made a very great effort to avoid being drawn into this war. It is undoubtedly true that the President and every other officer of the Government who really represented it in an executive capacity did everything in their power to prevent going to war, and I believe that course was justified. We can not always anticipate events. The Government was compelled to act upon incidents as they were then known, and I think the United States acted wisely in staying out of the war as long as it did. But I declared, Mr. President, that from the beginning of the outbreak of the war in Europe Germany was constantly and deliberately transgressing American rights, and we had a right to treat any of those acts as acts of war, and go to war with her. The Senator from Missouri nods his head, and he agrees. Therefore we have reached an agreement that the course which Germany had pursued against the United States would have justified this Government in entering the war sooner than she did enter it. But, Mr. President, in view of the great sacrifices which must have been anticipated, the Government was justified in seeking to avoid becoming a party to the war, and we did not enter the war until the President and the Congress became satisfied that there was no honorable way to avoid it. Germany had not only strewn the wreckage of very many American vessels on the surface of the sea; she had deliberately taken the lives of many noncombatants, including something like 215 citizens of the United States; but the argument which the Senator from Missouri made in ridiculing his colleagues in this Chamber because they approved in the beginning of an effort to preserve the neutrality of this Government in spite of German outrages on civilization falls when he admits that from the beginning the Government was justified, by the acts of Germany against her, in entering the war.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I wanted to remind the Senator from Arkansas that there were some other very important developments justifying the war, among them the discovery that Germany was carrying on a world-wide propaganda intending to break down Governments everywhere in the world and to conquer the world by military force, and we detected her in the act of embroiling this country with Mexico and Japan.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the reason why the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in December, 1918, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] on yesterday declared in effect that the United States went to war to save civilization. Does any Senator here doubt that if the United States had continued to the end to pursue a policy of neutrality civilization would have been destroyed and Germany would have overrun the world?

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] paints a glowing picture of the courage, the dash, the enthusiasm, the heroism, of the American soldiers and of the soldiers of France in battle. Ah, Mr. President, under the crosses on Flanders fields there sleep thousands of American boys who fell in battle. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri now if it is his position that this war should end, that we should break our relations with our allies, and that all the nations should go their separate ways and leave no organization for the prevention of international wars in the years to come?

Is the Senator from Missouri satisfied, after the beautiful picture of courage and sacrifice he painted this afternoon, to say that all that courage and all that sacrifice shall count for naught? With the blood in the trenches scarcely yet dry, the dead sleeping on the fields of battle, and the wounded coming back home to resume their status as citizens, can we not hope that the Senate of the United States will try to do something toward preserving the peace of the world in the future?

He has ridiculed and denounced the league of nations as impracticable and useless for the purpose of preventing war. What plan does the Senator propose? Mr. President, he can not answer that question with mere general objections to the plan which we have worked out. The only plan seriously proposed is the league of nations plan. The hope of the world is fixed on it.

It is true that the debates during the last 24 hours have disclosed a deliberate purpose to withdraw the support of the Government of the United States from the new nations which achieved their liberty as a result of the war and to leave them to their fate. But, Mr. President, are we to take the view of this matter which is urged by the Senator from Missouri? Are we to accept his declaration that article 10 will involve this Nation in numerous controversies and quarrels, and for that reason we must wash our hands of the whole affair and withdraw ourselves to a state of isolation? Let the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts answer him. Let the hope of all mankind answer him.

Mr. President, article 10 is the most vital and important part of this treaty. The pending reservation is intended to modify it.

I make no apology for it, but sincerely advocate it as the one provision which, more than any other in the treaty, is calculated to prevent international wars.

It does not seem to my mind to be subject to the objections and criticisms urged against it in the Senate.

Article 10 in no sense impairs the right of revolution or insurrection. It is directed against external aggression, and that can never be held to mean anything else than the application of force from the outside. By no expansion of recognized rules of construction can the prevention of external aggression be deemed to deny the rights of rebellion or revolution. Rebellion, revolt, and revolution are the application of force against a government by those who owe it allegiance or obedience. External aggression, in article 10, therefore, clearly means the attack of outside forces against the territorial integrity or political independence of a nation.

Article 10 bans or outlaws conquest. If the nations are not willing to forego conquest, if they are unwilling to bind themselves to restrain ambitious members from aggression, then the world had just as well never hope for permanent peace. Article 10, without reservation, will prove a powerful determent to nations disposed to engage in wars of conquest.

While the covenant contains four other important provisions which will discourage the resort to force in the settlement of international disputes, the obligation which all members of the league assume under article 10 to both respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of all States members of the league combines the moral and physical influences of all the other members of the league against any nation which may be inclined to trespass upon the territory or to restrict the political independence of any other member. The league agreement relative to disarmament, if executed in good faith, will diminish the likelihood and minimize the destructiveness of wars. If the size of armies and navies be limited as provided by the treaty—that is, so as to be sufficient merely for protective purposes and to carry out the obligations of the treaty—the world will thereby be relieved of enormous tax burdens, and permanent peace will be made probable. In addition to the reduction of armaments, the resort to arbitration of all justiciable questions and to investigation and recommendation for settlement of all other international disputes likely to result in war will leave very few subjects of international controversy unadjusted and to be determined by force.

In addition to the limitation on armaments and the proceedings for arbitration and settlement of international disputes, the commercial boycott authorized by the treaty, by means of which a nation refusing to arbitrate justiciable questions or to submit to investigation other international disputes before resorting to war will be denied commercial intercourse and financial relationship with every other member of the league, of itself will be sufficient to restrain impulsive and unnecessary attacks by one member nation upon another. Article 10 is the most vital and effective of all the means provided in the league covenant for the preservation of world peace.

This article is not objectionable to me because it may enable the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy to employ military or naval force in executing its obligations, nor is it objectionable because it may impose an obligation upon this Government to refrain from war or, under possible circumstances, to engage in it.

While I respect the Congress as one of the three indispensable and coordinate branches of our Government, its deliberations and enactments are not characterized by such preeminent wisdom and patriotism as to justify the mistrust of the Executive which runs through every line of the reservations and particularly through article 10. If we could forget all political rivalries and personal animosities, we would perhaps be willing to leave article 10 as it is and to trust to the Executive the fair execution of his duties under the treaty and under our Constitution.

The reservation is a complete nullification of article 10, in so far as the United States is concerned. That is the avowed purpose of the advocates of the reservation.

All Senators recognize that a treaty can not deprive Congress of its constitutional power to declare war. Nevertheless, by treaty the United States can contract to engage in war or to refrain from it, and while Congress can not be compelled to make a declaration of war, there is no ground, if we are in earnest in seeking to prevent war, which will justify the Congress in denying the obligation to restrain or prevent conquest by other nations save in particular cases where Congress has expressly declared war.

It seems to me cowardly to insist upon the creation of a league of nations and upon the United States becoming a party to it, and at the same time to make such reservations as to our duties and obligations as will disclose to the world a suspicion of other nations and a determination to preserve the United States in a condition of isolation.

Mr. President, any great debater like the Senator from Missouri can, of course, in the exercise of his imagination, point out defects in this treaty and defects in the league of nations. It was not to be expected that an organization perfect in every feature would be instantly conceived or effected. But, Mr. President, I rest the case here: The world is weary of the extravagance, the misery, the ruin, and the desolation of war. Great nations of this earth, who are the guardians of its civilization, ought to do something to prevent the recurrence of a conflict like that through which we have just passed. If we fail to do it, the war will never pay for itself. You can only compensate the mothers of America for the sacrifices which they have undergone, you can only compensate the gallant men who in our uniform advanced in the face of danger and death and experienced injuries, you can only compensate them for their sacrifice and suffering on foreign battle fields by using your brain to build up some instrumentality which, with the blessing of Almighty God and the prayers of all Christian peoples, may save the world in the future from what it has recently and bitterly experienced.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before I make the motion for a recess, which I am about to make, I may say just a word, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] was kind enough to refer to a speech I made in December, 1918, and he referred to it approvingly.

The view that I held then I think was a perfectly sound view. I think it was our duty to help establish certain States which would be barriers against Germany, and to help those States to make that start. I have not changed my opinion. But when I held that opinion, I never for a moment contemplated that we were to be handed out a document which bound us for all time, without any possible limitation anywhere.

The Senator from Arkansas seemed to me to draw no distinction between time and eternity. Perhaps there is none; but it is usually thought there is. I was speaking for time. Also, Mr. President, this has happened: While we have been establishing and helping new Governments, by our meddling we have deprived Poland of her issue to the sea. One of the things Poland wanted most, of course, was Danzig, at the mouth of the valley of the Vistula. We have taken it from her.

We declined to let France have the left bank of the Rhine, and that is why we have a treaty of alliance pending here now. We would not allow France to take measures to defend herself against Germany. We put our clumsy hand into Italy and brought on, by doing so, all the difficulties of Fiume.

Our last performance is to take Thrace from the Greeks, to whom it properly belongs. The sooner a country that so manages other people's affairs gets out of the business of meddling with other nations the better for the world.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri to give a notice.

Mr. REED. I simply want to state that to-morrow I shall take very great pleasure in replying to the attack of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and in calling attention to some mistakes he made, because they were mistakes.

Mr. OWEN. Before the Senator from Massachusetts makes a motion to recess, I should like to have permission to insert in the RECORD a certain matter.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to that; but I do not want to [illegible] any more debate at this time.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD copies of two resolutions bearing upon the matter under discussion, and a petition from the League for World Federation bearing on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Oklahoma will be granted.

Mr. FALL. I should like to know what it is the Senator is offering.

Mr. OWEN. Two resolutions which I introduced just after the war, stating what the causes of the war were in my opinion. It bears directly upon the discussion which has taken place here to-day.

Mr. FALL. I suppose the purpose is to have them printed and circulated as pamphlets. I have no objection.

Mr. OWEN. Not at all. I will confine myself to sending a copy to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. It will be very informing to me, as I listened to the Senator elucidating the reasons which he advanced, and I have followed him with great interest in his entire course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico object?

Mr. FALL. I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Oklahoma is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PETITION THAT THE INTERNATIONAL CONTRACT FOR LIBERATION OF SUBJECT STATES SHALL BE FULFILLED.

To the Senate of the United States:

The League for World Federation, established August, 1914, respectfully petitions the United Satte to place among its reservations to the proposed covenant of the league of nations that—

The international contract of November 5, 1918, whereby the World War was ended, provides that the league of nations shall be composed of free peoples; that there are to be no subject States in the league: but mandatories should be provided for the backward peoples, the council to issue to each a charter of liberties and maintain in each an administrative court to ascertain if freedom is being maintained.

The provision for free peoples is expressly contracted for by the allied States and the United States in their agreement with Germany for a world settlement based on justice and to result in permanent peace.

The sanctity of contractual obligations of nations is being insisted upon for the entire world, and surely the contractual obligation of the United States and the allied States for freedom for subject States is not to be repudiated. And this in connection with the war in which Germany is being execrated for not heeding her contractual obligations. Is the written contract of the United States and of the Allies for world liberation a scrap of paper?

It is a scrap of paper at the present moment, as we herein demonstrate, due to reactionism within the allied coalition Governments.

The issue is up to you, Senators, and here in brief are the facts:

I. The contract for liberation of subject States.

In a written statement dated November 5, 1918, the allied Governments, in a communication to Secretary Lansing which he issued to the world the next day, said:

"The allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence which has passed between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow, they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress in January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses. They must point out, however, that clause 2, relating to what is usually described as the freedom of the seas, is open to various interpretations, some of which they could not accept. They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.

"Further, in the conditions of peace laid down in his address to Congress on January 8, 1918, the President declared that invaded territories must be restored as well as evacuated and freed, and the allied Governments feel that no doubt ought to be allowed to exist as to what this provision implies. By it they understand that compensation will be made by Germany for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allies and their property by the aggression of Germany by land, by sea, and from the air."

This is the official statement of the allied Governments, and Secretary of State Lansing said:

"I am instructed by the President to say that he is in agreement with the interpretation set forth in the last paragraph of the memorandum above quoted."

Then Secretary Lansing said to the Swiss Minister in charge of German interests in the United States:

"I am further instructed by the President to request you to notify the German Government that Marshal Foch has been authorized by the Government of the United States and the Allied Governments to receive properly accredited representatives of the German Government, and to communicate to them the terms of the armistice."

The German Government appointed its representatives, who met Marshal Foch and accepted the terms, which included the above-quoted statement as to the basis for terms of peace—"the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress in January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses" with two exceptions, the freedom of the seas and the amount of the reparations.

These principles of settlement, expressly contracted for, include the freeing of subject States, as the following quotations demonstrate:

II. Principles of world settlement—the President's declarations.

In the President's address on January 8, 1918, in which he enumerated the 14 points, the closing paragraph is as follows:

"We have spoken now, surely, in terms too concrete to admit of any further doubt or question. An evident principle runs through the whole program I have outlined. It is the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities, and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be strong or weak. Unless this principle be made its foundation, no part of the structure of international justice can stand. The people of the United States could act upon no other principle; and to the vindication of this principle they are ready to devote their lives, their honor, and everything that they possess. The moral climax of this, the culminating and final war for human liberty, has come, and they are ready to put their own strength, their own highest purpose, their own integrity and devotion to the test."

Could there be a clearer declaration for world liberation and world organization? The words are:

"The moral climax of this, the culminating and final war for human liberty, has come!"

Previous to this he said:

"Unless this principle [of justice to all peoples and nationalities, and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be weak or strong] be made the foundation, no other part of the structure of international justice can stand."

In line with this is the President's earlier statement nearly a year before, January 22, 1917, wherein he said:

"No peace can last, or ought to last, which does not recognize and accept the principle that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. . . . These are American principles, American policies. We could stand for no others. And they are also the principles and policies of forward-looking men and women everywhere, of every modern nation, of every enlightened community. They are the principles of mankind and must prevail."

ADDRESS TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 11, 1918.

President Wilson on February 11 addressed a joint session of Congress in answer to Germany and Austria. He said:

"We are indomitable in our power of independent action and can in no circumstances consent to live in a world governed by intrigue and force. We believe that our own desire for a new international order under which reason and justice and the common interests of mankind shall prevail is the desire of enlightened men everywhere. Without that new order the world will be without peace, and human life will lack tolerable conditions of existence and development. Having set our hand to the task of achieving it, we shall not turn back.

"* * * I have spoken thus only that the whole world may know the true spirit of America—that men everywhere may know that our passion for justice and for self-government is no mere passion of words, but a passion which once set in action must be satisfied. The power of the United States is a menace to no nation of people. It will never be used in aggression or for the aggrandizement of any selfish interest of our own. It springs out of freedom and is for the service of freedom."

MOUNT VERNON, JULY 4, 1918.

At Mount Vernon, July 4, 1918, the President said:

"* * * The past and the present are in deadly grapple, and the peoples of the world are being done to death between them.

"There can be but one issue. The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise. No halfway decision would be tolerable. No halfway decision is conceivable. * * *

"These great objects can be put into a single sentence: What we seek is the reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed, and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind."

NEW YORK CITY ADDRESS, SEPTEMBER 7, 1918.

Again, on September 27, 1918, President Wilson, in an address at New York City, reiterated the fundamental principles and said:

"We accept the issues of the war as facts, not as any group of men here or elsewhere had defined them, and we can accept no outcome which does not squarely meet and settle them. Those issues are these:

"Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of people over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force?

"Shall strong nations be free to wrong weak nations and make them subject to their purpose and interest?

"Shall peoples be ruled and dominated, even in their own internal affairs, by arbitrary and irresponsible force or by their own will and choice?

"Shall there be a common standard of right and privilege for all peoples and nations, or shall the strong do as they will and the weak suffer without redress?

"Shall the assertion of right be haphazard and by casual alliance, or shall there be a common concert to oblige the observance of common rights?

"No man, no group of men, chose these to be the issues of the struggle. They are the issues of it; and they must be settled—by no arrangement or compromise or adjustment of interests, but definitely and once for all, and with a full and unequivocal acceptance of the principle that the interest of the weak is as sacred as the interest of the strongest.

"This is what we mean when we speak of a permanent peace, if we speak sincerely, intelligently, and with a real knowledge and comprehension of the matter we deal with.

* * * * * * * *

"If it be in deed and in truth the common object of the Governments associated against Germany and of the nations whom they govern, as I believe it to be, to achieve by the coming settlements a secure and lasting peace, it will be necessary that all who sit down at the peace table shall come ready and willing to pay the price, the only price, that will procure it; and ready and willing also to create in some virile fashion the only instrumentality by which it can be made certain that the agreements of the peace will be honored and fulfilled.

"That price is impartial justice in every item of the settlement, no matter whose interest is crossed; and not only impartial justice but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with. That indispensable instrumentality is a league of nations formed under covenants that will be efficacious. * * *

"* * * It is the peculiarity of this great war that while statesmen have seemed to cast about for definitions of their purpose and have sometimes seemed to shift their ground and their point of view, the thought of the mass of men, whom statesmen are supposed to instruct and lead, has grown more and more unclouded, more and more certain of what it is that they are fighting for. National purposes have fallen more and more into the background and the common purpose of enlightened mankind has taken their place. The counsels of plain men have become on all hands more simple and straightforward and more unified than the counsels of sophisticated men of affairs, who still retain the impression that they are playing a game of power and high stakes. That is why I have said that this is a people's war, not a statesman's. Statesmen must follow the clarified common thought or be broken.

"* * * It [the world] wishes the final triumph of justice and fair dealing. The sort of peace which will bring security and reassurance to all peoples and make the recurrence of another such struggle of pitiless force and bloodshed forever impossible."

This is a program for liberty, justice, and perpetual peace—the liberal program. The plain meaning is that one of the essential elements for an enduring peace is free States everywhere!

And this is the contract of November 5, 1918, affirmed by the peace conference:

III. Affirmed by peace conference, January 25, 1919.

At a session of the plenary council of the peace conference, January 25, 1919, at which was decided to install a league of nations in the treaty of peace, President Wilson delivered the principal address, and in it he said:

"We are here to see that every people in the world shall choose its own masters and govern its own destinies, not as we wish but as they wish.

"We are to see, in short, that the very foundations of this war are swept away. Those foundations were the private choice of a small coterie of civil rulers and military staffs. Those foundations were the aggressions of great powers upon small. Those foundations were the holding together of empires of unwilling subjects by the duress of armies. * * *

"And nothing less than the emancipation of the world from these things will accomplish peace * * *

"And, thank God, these lines have been accepted as the lines of settlement by all of the high-minded men who have had to do with the beginning of this business."

The next speaker in the plenary council was Premier Lloyd-George, who said:

"I should not have intervened at all, but it was necessary for me to state how emphatically the people of the British Empire are behind this proposal; and if the leaders of the British Empire have not been able to devote so much time during the past five years as they would have liked to this question, the reason is that they were occupied with other questions that were more urgent for the moment."

Also supporting speeches were made by representatives of France, Italy, Japan, and other powers. Not a note of dissent was struck.

And two days later, January 27, 1919, the conferees agreed that the former overseas possessions of Germany should be placed under the guardianship of the league of nations, the several nations to become mandatories.

Then occurred a silent eclipse of the pledge of the allied coalition Governments and of the United States for freedom for their subject states:

IV. Silent eclipse of the pledge by the allied coalition Governments and United States Government for freedom for their subject states.

Just how it occurred is not publicly known, except that the policy of repudiating this pledge was not taken before the public. The subject States were almost entirely outside of Europe and they were not connected with the agitation then in progress in Europe for the installation of the people's rule. Whatever reasons then existed for refusing to carry out the pledge and for not taking the question before the world, to-day there is every reason for discussing it and carrying out the contract.

World liberation is practicable. Such portions of Ireland as desire to become free have as much right to do so as has Poland. And the backward people who are being held as subjects by the Allies and the United States should all be placed under the tutelage of the league of nations and mandatories, as is being done with the former overseas possessions of Germany. The principle is that the existing alien rule in Egypt, Indian, Korea, and the other subject States held by the Europeans is horribly wrong, as the following facts demonstrate:

V. The evils from alien rule.

SECTION A. THE AWFUL BASIS OF ALIEN RULE.

Where the rule of the few is by members of the same nationality that is being ruled, the evil is very serious. The evil is much worse where the rulers are resident aliens; and very, very much worse where the rulers are aliens living in another country. This is real alien rule.

Each of the leading nations of Europe are real alien rulers. They are ruling foreign nations, and in doing so the primary aim is the undue benefit of the rulers, at the expense of their political slaves. In doing this the foreign rulers are shipping out of the thickly populated lands a considerable portion of the raw products. This is horrible.

Added to this is the difference in nationality or of race, the foreign rulers forcibly asserting their superiority, although it may consist merely in brute force.

Then, in order to help hold their slaves in subjection, they refuse to educate them, keeping them in ignorance. Also these foreign rulers slyly develop prejudices between the different sects of their slaves; as, for instance, between Mohammedans and Hindus; and develop prejudices between the different nationalities. Nor do the foreign rulers strive to lessen the differences in dialects, well knowing that "divide and conquer" is the basis of their sway, plus the region of force and the suppression of free speech, accompanied by mutual hatred and cruelty.

But mankind has entered the democratic new age—the era of the brotherhood of man. For the first time on earth the people's stage of development is such that they are in power in the leading nations of earth whenever they exert themselves, and to their self-interest in ending competition in armament and war is joined a desire to free the last of earth's slaves. Alien rule is being ended; the freed peoples in the former German colonies are to receive a charter of liberties from the league of nations, buttressed by an administrative court, so as to ascertain continuously if the liberty-giving charter is being applied; and these blessings for all subject States were contracted for as the basis for closing the World War. We in the United States must valiantly stand for it.

SECTION B. THE AUTOCRATIC MECHANISM OF ALIEN RULE.

One is greatly surprised to learn of the mechanism whereby this dreadful alien rule is maintained. The trick whereby this vicious system has been retained by the British Empire has recently been told by the secretary of state for India, Mr. E. S. Montagu, a life-long Liberal. He, while explaining to the House of Commons the cause of the disaster in the Mesopotamia campaign, said, July 12, 1917:

"It has sometimes been questioned whether a democracy can rule an empire. I say that in this instance the democracy never had an opportunity of trying. For even if the House of Commons were to give orders to the secretary of state, the secretary of state is not his own master. In matters vitally affecting India he can be overruled by a majority of his council. * * * And these gentlemen are appointed for seven years, and can only be controlled from the houses of Parliament by resolution carried in both houses calling on them for their resignations. The whole system of the India office is designed to prevent control by the House of Commons for fear that there might be too advanced a secretary of state."

This is only one part of the grossly reactionary system deliberately designed to prevent control by the people's representatives of the British Isles. The members of the India council at London are men "who come home after lengthy service in India to spend the first years of their retirement as members of the council of India," the result being, said Mr. Montagu, the inefficiency shown to exist, requiring "the practice of telegrams backward and forward and of private telegrams, commented upon [unfavorably] by the Mesopotamia report."

Continuing, Mr. Montagu said:

"Does any member of this house know much about the procedure in the India office, how the council sits in committees, how there is interposed between the civil servants and the political chiefs the committee of the India council, and how the draft on some simple question comes up through the civil servant to the undersecretary of state, and may be referred back to the committee, which sends it back to him and it then goes to the secretary of state, who then sends it to the India council, which may refer it back to the committee, and two or three times in its history it may go backward and forward. I say that this system is cumbrous, so designed to prevent efficiency and change, that in the light of these revelations [made by the Mesopotamia commission] it can not continue to exist . . . the statutory organization of the India office produces an apotheosis of circumlocution and red tape beyond the dreams of any ordinary citizen."

This monstrosity is the system after nine years of rule by the British Liberal Government, 1906–1915. Doubtless it must have been the selfishness of the people of the British Isles that prevented the noted Liberals from doing the manly thing—prevented them from promoting the welfare of their foreign slaves. Now, however, the question has become a world problem, and Divine Providence has so constructed human affairs that the only way whereby the self-governing people, the democracies, can free themselves from competition in armament and war is to first free their subject peoples—put an end to alien rule. And as the Irish question has not yet been settled it brings forward in United States politics an irresistible element for the maintenance of the international contract for world liberation, a contract to which the United States is a party.

VII. Summary and conclusion—Now is the time for the United States Senate to act.

We have shown the existence of an international contract for world settlement, including a declaration for freedom for subject States. And we also have pointed to a practical method for maintaining their freedom—for the backward people the protection by the league of nations and active assistance by mandatories. The need for international protection to end the selfish domination by alien rulers is extremely urgent. And the time has arrived to go forward, the United States Senate being the forum. Should the Senate become a party to the existing repudiation of contract for free peoples, then within the league of nations a single member in the council can actually veto an amendment. Therefore the existing contract, purchased by the death of 7,000,000 human lives, 100,000 being our fellow citizens, should be maintained. Furthermore, the idea of human freedom is our American birthright. Each Senator can conscientiously vote for it.

Respectfully submitted.

LEAGUE FOR WORLD FEDERATION,
By GEORGE H. SHIBLEY, President.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 6, 1919.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 94) proposing as a war measure an international convention for the purpose of terminating international anarchy, establishing international government in lieu thereof, and coercing the Teutonic military conspiracy by the organized commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of the world.

"Resolved, etc., That it is the opinion of the representatives of the people of the United States assembled in Congress that international government, supported by international force, should be immediately organized to take the place of the existing international anarchy; that competing armaments should be replaced by a noncompetitive international army and navy; that the Teutonic military conspiracy to dominate the world should be overthrown by the combined commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of the world.

"That international government should be based upon the following principles:

"First. Every civilized nation and informed people should have the unquestionable right of internal self-government, with exclusive control within its own territory over immigration, emigration, imports, exports, and all internal affairs, with the right to make its own political and commercial affiliations.

"Second. The oceans and high seas should be free and open under international rules. All international waterways, straits, and canals should be open on equal terms to the citizens of all nations. Equal terms should be arranged for fuel, repairs, and dockage in all ports for the ships belonging to the citizens of all nations.

"Third. All interior nations having no seaports should have the right of shipment of their goods in bond on equal terms and conditions, without tax, through any intervening territory to the seaports of any other nation with equal access to shipping facilities.

"Fourth. That there should be established by international agreement an international organization of all civilized nations with an international legislative council to draft rules of international law to be submitted to the several nations for approval. That when such rules of international law are approved by the parliaments, or law-making branch of the Governments of three-fourths of the member nations, representing three-fourths of the total population of all the member nations, such international rules should be binding on all member nations. Such rules should be limited to the powers expressly delegated to such international legislative council and strictly confined to international affairs.

"Fifth. The international legislative council should elect and define the duties of a representative international executive cabinet to execute and enforce the rules established as international law.

"Sixth. The international legislative council should have representatives from each member nation exercising a voting power according to relative population, relative wealth, and relative governmental development, to be determined by international agreement.

"Seventh. The international legislative council should establish and define the duties of an international supreme court, with power to pass upon all questions of international controversy incapable of diplomatic adjustment but with no power to pass on questions affecting the reserved rights of nations.

"Eighth. The international legislative council should formulate the method for raising an international army and navy and for establishing an international blockade and other means for enforcing the rights of member nations under international law, such army and navy to be provided and sustained by the member nations pro rata according to relative population and wealth.

"Ninth. With the conclusion of the present war the nations of the world should agree to reduce in progressive stages their land and sea forces to a point preferably not to exceed internal or local police purposes and the quota required for the international army and navy.

"With progressive disarmament and international peace safeguarded by world government dissatisfied nations now held captive by dominant nations for strategical purposes could be safely given their liberty.

"Tenth. That the international army and navy should not be authorized to exercise military force further than to prevent or suppress the invasion of the territorial integrity of any of the member nations and in the blockade and embargo to enforce international law.

"Eleventh. That it should be a violation of international law and the highest international crime for any nation on any alleged ground to invade the territorial limits of another nation. The penalty of such invasion should be immediate international blockade of the invading nation, embargo on all mail, express, and freight to or from such nation, and the suppression of such invasion by the international army and navy.

"Twelfth. That nations backward in education, industrial and economic development, and in the knowledge of the principles of government should have their rights safeguarded on the principles of freedom, humanity, and justice by international agreement with a view to future self-government.

"Thirteenth. It is clearly realized that the program of progressive disarmament or permanent world peace is impossible of attainment until the military forces now ruling the Teutonic people, first, either voluntarily acquiesce in progressive disarmament and international justice as the basis of world peace; second, are forced to do so by the Teutonic people; or, third, are coerced to do so by the combined powers of the world.

"Fourteenth. That in order to bring this war to an early termination the belligerent nations opposing the Teutonic powers should immediately cohere on a plan of international government pledging justice and peace to all member nations and the coercion of the military autocracy of Prussia by the commercial, financial, military, and naval forces of the world, giving assurance, nevertheless, to the Government of Germany and Austria of their willingness to admit the Teutonic powers as members of the proposed international union on equal terms with other nations when they shall have met the conditions and given satisfactory guaranties.

"Fifteenth. In our opinion no reliance should be placed upon the vague suggestions of peace of the Teutonic military autocracy, but that their obscure proposals should be regarded merely as a military ruse. The peace resolution of the Reichstag, while promising well for the attitude of the German people, when they achieve self-government, can not at present be regarded as a proposal binding on or capable of enforcement by the German people, because they do not control their own Government, but are mere subjects and puppets of a military autocracy which has long conspired and still dreams of conquering the world by military force and terrorism. The United States and the nations opposing militarism should strenuously prosecute the war with every available resource, and no separate peace should be made by any of them until the menace of the military autocracy of Germany is removed.

"Sixteenth. It is our opinion that if a world-wide agreement can be established on the above principles, and the men now engaged in slaughter and destructive activities can be returned to productive industry, the world could quickly recover the gigantic shock of the present war and would be able without serious difficulty to soon repair the material injuries and losses already suffered.

"Seventeenth. The United States does not enter this war for material advantage, for any selfish purpose, or to gratify either malice or ambition. The United States will not approve forcible annexations or mere punitive indemnities, but it will approve a free Poland, the restoration of territory wrongfully taken from France and Italy, and restorative indemnity to Belgium and Serbia, and the adjustment of other differences by international conferences. It will favor extending international credits for the restoration of all places made waste by war. The United States enters this war in self-defense; to protect its own citizens and the nations of the world in their present and future rights to life and liberty on land and sea. It does not wish the world to remain an armed camp.

"Eighteenth. No peace is desirable until the world can be safeguarded against a repetition of the present war. Competitive armaments must be ended and replaced by international cooperative armaments in order to assure permanent world peace.

"Nineteenth. That the President of the United States shall immediately submit the above resolution to the belligerent nations now defending themselves against Prussian military autocracy and invite them and all neutral nations by wire to an international convention for the purpose of considering the above principles and taking affirmative action for the early suppression of the Teutonic military autocratic conspiracy by the combined commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of all nations.

"Twentieth. The sum of $400,000 is hereby appropriated to meet the cost of promoting such convention."

Senate concurrent resolution 17.

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), The United States declared a state of war existing between the Imperial Government of Germany and the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria and the United States because of their repeated willful violations of the rights of the people of the United States under the acknowledged principles of international law; the sinking of unarmed merchant vessels and of hospital and Red Cross ships; the destruction of the lives of unoffending American citizens on their lawful business on the high seas on many occasions, filling the United States with spies and secret agents; conspiring the wholesale destruction of American industries by arson, by explosions and murder; systematically promoting sedition and treason among our citizens, and the criminal violation of our laws by the German and Austrian aliens residing in the United States; endeavoring to incite the hostility and aversion of other nations against the United States, and to persuade Mexico and Japan to make war upon the United States, and many other wrongful acts contrary to the laws of nations and in violation of justice and of humanity; and for the further reason that it had finally become known to the United States from indisputable evidence that the military masters of Germany and Austria had deliberately and secretly conspired to bring about an elaborately prepared offensive war by which and through which they intended, first, to dominate Europe, nation by nation, and then to dominate the other unprepared nations of the earth and establish a military world dominion.

"For many years past the governing powers of Germany and Austria have by world-wide intrigue carried on a systematic attempt to disorganize public opinion in the United States and in the other nations of the world for the purpose of breaking down the powers of resistance of other nations against this conspiracy for world dominion by exciting nation against nation and internal disorders among the nations that might oppose this sinister design.

"The United States has not forgotten that the military rulers of Germany and Austria deliberately prevented international agreements at the various Hague conventions for arbitration of international differences, abatement of armaments, and world peace.

"The United States recognizes this war as an offensive war of the completely prepared German and Austrian military autocracies against the unsuspecting and inadequately prepared democracies of the world in pursuance of the policy laid down in the first and second articles of the secret treaty of Verona of November 22, 1822, in which the autocratic rulers of Prussia and Austria solemnly pledged their powers to each other to overthrow all 'representative' governments on earth, the consummation of which design the Prussian and Austrian autocratic group has steadily and secretly kept in view, and that this war had for its objects the premeditated slaughter and robbery of the innocent peoples of other nations for the sordid and base purposes of annexation, indemnity, robbery, and commercial profit by military force and terrorism and ultimate world dominion.

"The United States finally recognized the unavoidable necessity of meeting the forces of this military conspiracy on the battle fields of Europe in order to prevent the military rulers of Germany and Austria succeeding in the first step of mastering Europe as a means to mastering and robbing America.

"The United States can not be deceived by those military leaders of Germany and Austria who now, before their own people, pretend to be waging a war of defense and to desire an honorable peace, but whose every act has clearly demonstrated to the whole world that they deliberately planned and are still persisting in this unspeakably brutal war, with their sinister purposes unchanged, and which they are still attempting to carry out by terrorism, intrigue, and systematic falsehood and deceit at home and abroad.

"The United States can not confide in any statement or promise emanating from such a perfidious source until the German and Austrian people in fact and in sober truth can control the conduct of their agents and compel them to observe the rules of morality and good faith.

"The unbounded ambition and deceit of the Prussian military autocrats are again exposed in shameless nakedness before the German and Austrian people, their allies, and the world at large, in their present demands of annexation of adjacent Russian territory and other demands contemplating the domination of the Russian and Polish people, in flat violation of their own Reichstag's recent pledges against annexation and indemnity.

"The United States feels for the Russian people the liveliest sympathy in their great losses in life and property at the hands of the German and Austrian autocrats, as well as their magnificent and glorious struggles in behalf of freedom and democratic world peace.

"Having passed through many severe tests and trials in establishing popular government in America, the people of the United States, through their own directly elected representatives, desire to extend to the Russian people the cordial hand of fellowship in their new-found freedom and to assure their democratic brothers in Russia that we earnestly desire to render them, so far as possible, every assistance they may need and which they themselves desire.

"The United States did not enter this war for material advantage or for any selfish purpose or to gratify either malice or ambition.

"The United States will not approve of forcible annexations or mere punitive indemnities, even on the misguided people of Austria or of Germany, but demands the complete evacuation of all territory invaded during the present war by the German and Austrian troops, and the restoration and indemnity of Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, and Montenegro.

"The United States believes that righting the wrong done to the French people by the Prussian Government in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine will remove long-pending grievances due to previous military aggression and will promote future world peace.

"The United States believes that a readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognized lines of nationality; that an independent Polish state should be established over territory indisputably occupied by Polish people; that the peoples of Austria-Hungary, of the Balkans, and of the Ottoman Empire should have the right of autonomous development.

"The United States will favor recognizing and protecting by an international alliance the territorial integrity of all nations, great and small; the maintenance of the right of unembarrassed self-determination of all nations, and the right of such nations to manage their own affairs by internal self-government; and safeguarding the rights of backward peoples by international agreement.

"The United States will favor extending international credits for the restoration of all places made waste by war.

"The United States will insist that the oceans and high seas and international waterways and canals shall be open on equal terms to the citizens of all nations; that all nations shall have the untaxed right of access to the sea of their goods in bond, through any intervening territory to the seaports of other nations, with equal access to shipping facilities.

"The United States will favor the removal, as far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of equal trade conditions among all the nations of the world consenting to peace and associating themselves for its maintenance without interfering with the right of any nation to govern its own imports and exports.

"The United States will insist that adequate guaranties shall be given and taken to the end that national armaments on land and sea should be reduced to the lowest points consistent with domestic safety.

"The United States will favor an open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the claims of the Governments whose titles are to be determined.

"The United States recognizes that a general association of civilized nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to nations, great and small alike, and of maintaining world peace, and believes that under such a system dissatisfied peoples now held under subjection to dominating nations for strategical purposes could be safely given their liberty and autonomy as the rights of the dominant nation would be made safe by the general association of nations, and the subject nation would cease to be a coveted asset against future war.

"The United States believes that under such general association of nations it should be a violation of international law and the highest international crime for any nation, on any alleged ground, to invade by military power the territorial limits of another nation, and that the penalty for such invasions should be the immediate international blockade of the invading and offending nation, an embargo on all mail, express, and freight to and from such nation, and the suppression of such invasion by the combined forces of the general association of nations organized for the protection of world peace.

"The United States believes that all future international treaties should be made in the open, where all the world may know of the proceedings in the framing of such treaties, and that secret diplomacy and international intrigue should end.

"The United States desires to be on friendly terms, political, commercial, and social, with the people of every nation, including those now under the control of the German and Austrian military autocracies, and to restore as speedily as possible these friendly relations with the German and Austrian people as soon as they organize a Government responsible to the will of the people of Germany and Austria, and whenever they shall themselves demonstrate a willingness to deal with the other nations of the world on a basis of equality, justice, and humanity, and are willing to abandon the atrocious and detestable doctrine of making war for annexation, indemnity, and profit.

"The United States entered this war to protect the rights of its own citizens to life and liberty, to protect is own future, to make the world safe from the future menace of military despotism, dynastic ambitions, or competing armaments, to establish permanent world peace on a basis of international justice, righteousness, and humanity, and, in cooperation with the self-governing belligerent nations, will maintain these principles, whatever the cost, with firmness and resolution until these ends are fully accomplished."

ORDER FOR EVENING SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that at not later than 6 o'clock p. m. to-day the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I now ask unanimous consent that at the evening session the Senate will consider the bill known as the District of Columbia police salary bill, and that no other business will be considered; and further, that at the evening session, upon the conclusion of the consideration of the bill named, the Senate will take a recess, as in open executive session, until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous consent agreement asked? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (George A. Sanderson) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., November 11, 1919.

To the SENATE:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence at the evening session.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President Pro Tempore.

Mr. SMOOT thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer at the evening session.

METROPOLITAN POLICE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will proceed to the consideration of House bill 9821, Order of business 238.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9821) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That paragraphs 2, 3, 8, and 9 of section 1 of the act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, as amended by the act entitled "An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' approved February 28, 1901," approved June 8, 1906, as amended, are amended to read as follows:

"PAR. 2. (a) The commissioners of said District shall appoint to office, assign to such duty or duties as they may prescribe, and promote all officers and members of said Metropolitan police force: Provided, That all officers, members, and civilian employees of the force, except the major and superintendent, the assistant superintendents, and the inspectors, shall hereafter be appointed and promoted in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," approved January 16, 1883, as amended, and the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof, in the same manner as members of the classified civil service of the United States: Provided further, That hereafter the assistant superintendents and inspectors shall be selected from among the captains of the force and shall be returned to the rank of captain when the commissioners so determine.

"(b) All original appointments of privates shall be made to class 1. Privates who have served one year in class 1 shall be transferred to class 2, and privates who have served two year in class 2 shall be transferred to class 3. Such transfers shall not be subject to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," approved January 16, 1883, as amended, and the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof: Provided, That hereafter, in order that the full complement of the Metropolitan police force may at all times be maintained, as authorized by law, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized, when vacancies occur in classes 2 and 3 of said Metropolitan police force which can not be filled by transfer, to appoint privates in class 1 equal in number to the positions vacated in said classes 2 and 3; and the respective salaries specifically provided for such vacant positions may be reduced to pay the salaries of the privates so appointed in class 1.

"PAR. 3. The said Metropolitan police force shall consist of one major and superintendent, who shall continue to be invested with such powers and charged with such duties as is provided by existing law; and also 2 assistant superintendents, 4 surgeons for the police and fire departments, 3 inspectors, 12 captains, 21 lieutenants, 1 of whom shall be harbor master, and such number of sergeants and privates of class 3, privates of class 2, privates of class 1, patrol drivers, mounted inspectors, captains, lieutenants, sergeants, and privates on horses and bicycles, and such others as said commissioners may deem necessary within the appropriations made by Congress: Provided, That patrol drivers shall not be rated above privates of class 2, and, if appointed since April 6, 1917, shall be subject to physical and other tests as new appointees: Provided further, That the inspectors shall perform the duties at present required of captains in the force; that the captains shall command precincts and perform such other duties in connection therewith as the laws and regulations of the said commissioners may prescribe.

"PAR. 8. (a) The annual basic salaries of the officers and members of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia shall be as follows: Major and superintendent, $4,500; assistant superintendents, $3,000; inspectors, $2,500; police surgeons, $1,800; captains, $2,500; lieutenants, $2,000; sergeants, $1,800; privates of class 3, $1,660; privates of class 2, $1,560; privates of class 1, $1,460.

"(b) Members of the force who may be mounted on horses, furnished and maintained by themselves, shall each receive an extra compensation of $600 per annum; members of the force who may be mounted on motor vehicles, furnished and maintained by themselves, shall each receive an extra compensation of $480 per annum; and members of the force who may be mounted on bicycles shall each receive an extra compensation of $75 per annum.

"(c) The annual basic salaries of the civilian employees of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia shall be as follows: Chief clerk (who shall also be property clerk), $2,500; one clerk, $1,800; one clerk and stenographer, $1,700; one clerk (who shall also be assistant property clerk), $1,400; one clerk, $1,400; three clerks, $1,200; one clerk, $900; patrol drivers, $1,200; telephone clerks, $1,100; janitors, $900; laborer, $900; messenger, $900; matrons, $900.

"House of Detention: Clerks, $1,200; drivers, $1,000; guards, $1,000; janitor, $900; matrons, $900.

"Harbor patrol: Engineers, $1,400; firemen, $1,000; watchmen, $900; deck hands, $1,000.

"(d) Every officer, member, or civilian employee of the Metropolitan police at the time this act becomes law shall, in addition to the salary received by him for his period of service between August 1, 1919, and the time this act becomes law, receive for such period the difference between such salary and the salary payable to him under the provisions of this act, for a period of equal duration.

"PAR. 9. Whenever the Commissioners of the District of Columbia determine that any member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia has become a member of any organization which is affiliated, directly or indirectly, with any association or organization which approves, counsels, advises, or consults with any other association or organization of or concerning a strike or cessation of service or work by said police or any of them, they shall immediately discharge such member from the force. Any member of the police who enters into a conspiracy, combination, or agreement with the intent or purpose of substantially interfering with or obstructing the efficient conduct or operation of the police force in the District of Columbia by a strike or other disturbance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $300 or by imprisonment of not more than six months, or by both.

"No officer or member of the said police force, under penalty of forfeiting the salary or pay which may be due him, shall withdraw or resign, except by permission of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, unless he shall have given the major and superintendent one month's notice in writing of such intention."

SEC. 2. That one-half of the amount necessary to provide for the increased salaries and compensation of the Metropolitan police force is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to supplement the amounts appropriated for the members and employees of the Metropolitan police mentioned in the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919.

SEC. 3. That the watchmen provided by the United States Government for services in any of the public squares and reservations in the District of Columbia shall hereafter be known as the "United States Police," and their annual basic salaries shall be as follows: Lieutenant, $1,900; first sergeant, $1,700; sergeants, $1,580; privates, $1,360: Provided, That every watchman employed for such service at the time this act becomes law shall, in addition to the salary received by him for the period of service between August 1, 1919, and the time this act becomes law, receive for such period the difference between such salary and the salary payable to him under the provisions of this section for a period of equal duration.

SEC. 4. That to provide for the increased salaries and compensation of the United States Police, so much as is necessary is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supplement the amounts appropriated for park watchmen mentioned in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1919.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee in regard to the item on page 7, line 2. When the District appropriation bill was being considered the committee in charge was asked to add after the word "clerk," as it appears in line 2, the words "who shall be a stenographer, $1,800." I see this bill only provides that the clerk shall receive $1,800 and does not provide that that clerk shall be a stenographer. I ask the chairman of the committee or the Senator in charge of the bill, with this item left as it is, if we are not paying an ordinary clerk regardless of qualifications more than we pay a clerk and stenographer as provided in the next line?

I will state, in addition, that a clerk who shall be stenographer at $1,800 was put in at the request of the commissioners. The committee also provided a clerk and stenographer at $1,500, and your committee has provided for a clerk and stenographer at $1,700. I am not objecting to the amount of the salary, but I do think that you are making a mistake in not adding after the word "clerk" in line 2 in brackets the words "who shall be a stenographer." As I stated, that was put in at the request of the commissioners when the bill was in the Senate before. I think if you do not do that you will be paying a clerk more than you are paying a clerk and stenographer.

Mr. CALDER. My recollection of the matter is that we followed the title of the clerical force now in the employ of the police department of the city. I have no objection to inserting the words "who shall be a stenographer," if the Senator wishes to have those words inserted.

Mr. CURTIS. I will read from the law:

Clerk (who shall be a stenographer), $1,800.

That was put in at the request of the commissioners when we had the District appropriation bill before us. Mr. President, I move to add after the word "clerk" in line 2 the words in brackets "who shall be a stenographer."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to it, Mr. President.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if on page 7 the last six words of line 22 and the first five words of line 23 were omitted as to whether the paragraph would not be stronger and fairer? As it now reads it would be quite possible for a member of the force to belong to an organization which itself believed in and counseled and advised strikes for policemen, because the only prohibition is that they shall not belong to any organization which is affiliated with an organization that believes in strikes. There is nothing which prohibits the individual organization itself from counseling and advising and believing in strikes. I do not see any great harm in the affiliation if the organization to which the policeman himself belongs does not believe or counsel or consult with regard to strikes.

Of course we all agree that policemen ought not to be in a position to tie up the public service by strikes, but I submit if the last six words of line 22 and the first five words of line 23 were stricken out the paragraph would be stronger and fairer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri offer that as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this is intended to cover affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. The local union of policemen in Washington affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and received a charter. The American Federation of Labor does not call strikes; it disclaims to have the right, and does not exercise the power to call strikes. All strikes are called, in the event they are, by the local unions. All that the American Federation of Labor does is to consult with or advise with the local, either approving or disapproving the strike or cessation of service.

This is intended to cover that condition without naming the American Federation of Labor. It was not thought advisable to name any particular organization in the country, but only by general phrase to cover the condition that would make it impossible for the local union to affiliate with any outside body that in any manner consulted or advised the calling of a strike or the cessation of service. That was the purpose.

Mr. SPENCER. If the organization to which the individual policeman belongs was an organization which neither approved, counseled, advised, or consulted with regard to a strike, would not that answer every purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not. I think it much safer to have it cover the organization itself. It is a prohibition of the affiliation with any other organization, which in this particular instance is the American Federation of Labor, that disciplines by withholding or revoking a charter or by approving or disapproving a strike. It is intended to cover that.

Mr. SPENCER. I think it does cover affiliation, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it does not cover the local union itself. So far as this paragraph is concerned, a policeman could belong to a union that believed, counseled, and advised a strike.

Mr. THOMAS. I think, if the Senator will permit me, that the first complete sentence on page 8 would meet the objection which he makes to the phraseology to which he refers.

Mr. SPENCER. It might, because, of course, if the policeman was a member of the union he would have to join with the other members in the act.

Mr. THOMAS. My impression is that the second sentence of the paragraph is ample.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the second sentence on page 8 covers it entirely.

Mr. CALDER. I may add that no member of the local police force, as far as I know, has objected to this language.

Mr. SPENCER. Is it satisfactory to them?

Mr. CALDER. They have not complained of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The local police union has in its organization a prohibition of strikes. It is merely a fraternal association as it is now, and in the event strikes were included the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have full power over them to enforce such necessary discipline as the force needs.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I wish the chairman of the committee or some member of it would explain the general effect of the bill, the amount of salary increase, the necessary increase of appropriation to pay it, the amount of increase to the general classes or divisions of the police force, and whether that bears a reasonable or ratable proportion to the amount of increase in the salaries of other Federal employees in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if I may reply to the Senator from Arkansas, the bill increases the pay of all the members of the police force here in the District. The committee believes that this increase is necessary. There has been no increase of any moment for a very long period. The members of the police force are required to be on duty every day in the year except during their vacation period; in fact, on many days they are on duty 24 hours of the day.

This bill increases the pay of the superintendent of police from $4,000 to $4,500; of the assistant superintendents from $2,500 to $3,000; of the inspectors from $2,000 to $2,500; of the captains from $2,000 to $2,500; of the police surgeons from $840 to $1,800; of the lieutenants of police from $1,600 to $2,000; of the sergeants from $1,400 to $1,800; of the privates of the third class from $1,320 to $1,660; of the privates of the second class from $1,200 to $1,560; and of the privates of the first class from $1,080 to $1,460.

Mr. KIRBY. Those are the amounts proposed to be fixed by the law for their pay. There is no additional of $140 or $240 a year for them, is there?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; they will get the $240 in addition to salaries indicated.

Mr. KIRBY. The salaries of these different officials and classes of officers are fixed at the amount indicated, and in addition to that they get $240 apiece?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; but the additional $240, of course, is only temporary. The men in the department receiving over $2,500 a year will not receive the so-called war bonus.

Mr. President, the committee has also provided in this bill a method of appointment to the police force somewhat different from that which has existed in the past. There has been some complaint in the District through all administrations that men were often appointed on the police force through favoritism.

We have written into this bill a civil-service provision which will make it possible for every man to apply for appointment and to have an equal chance for appointment. This applies also to promotions up to the grade of captain. Men may be designated to act as assistant superintendents and inspectors from the rank of captain without taking the examination for the promotion, and may thereafter be reduced to the rank of captain.

The committee believes that these increases are very essential at this time. These men are required to pay for their own uniforms; and, as I said a moment ago, they are required to be subject to call at any moment, either night or day. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] knows of the recent race difficulties here in the District, during the course of which one policeman was killed while performing his duty and several were severely wounded, from which wounds, perhaps, they will never recover. In these days of unrest and uncertainty, it seemed to the committee exceedingly important that here at the Capital city of the Nation there should exist good feeling on the part of our police force toward the Government itself. It seemed to us that the responsibility was quite up to Congress to see that the men who are the guardians of the Capital of this great Government under all the circumstances should be properly paid. The committee are strongly of this opinion; and we hope that there will be no objection to the enactment of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I notice that the only considerable increase in the bill is in the salary of police surgeons, who are now getting $840. The House bill allowed them $1,400, which would be a substantial increase, but the Senate bill makes their salary $1,800. That is an increase of nearly $1,000—more than double. Can the Senator give the reason for that great increase?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the police surgeons also act as surgeons for the fire department. They are required to pass upon the physical qualifications of policemen and firemen when they are appointed, and they are also required to take care of them to a certain extent and to perform other service. Surgeons performing like duties in other cities are receiving from $2,500 to $4,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if these police surgeons have any outside practice of their own?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; I believe they have.

Mr. THOMAS. So that they have an income independent of their official salary?

Mr. CALDER. They have, Mr. President.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, my recollection is that in the hearings before the subcommittee on the District appropriation bill the showing was that these men did have an outside practice, and for that reason the Committee on Appropriations in considering the District of Columbia appropriation bill refused to increase their salary over and above $840. I think if these surgeons are going to be permitted to have outside practice, the large increase here proposed is not justified; and, if it is in order, I am going to move to reduce the amount from $1,800 to $1,400, being the amount fixed by the other House.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SPENCER. Under the House bill carrying a salary of $1,400 the surgeons were assigned only to police duty, while in the Senate bill they are assigned both to the police and fire department. Does not the Senator think that that makes some difference?

Mr. CURTIS. No; because they will only have to perform the same duties required of them heretofore. I understand there is nothing added to their duties. Of course, if it is proposed to reduce the number of surgeons and require them to devote all their time to the public service, then $1,800 is not too much; but if these surgeons—and there are four of them—are going to be permitted to enjoy outside practice, surely they ought not to be given this increase of nearly a thousand dollars, to which will be added $240, making the salary of each one something over $2,000 a year.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, are they not required also to answer emergency calls throughout the city?

Mr. CURTIS. I can not say as to that.

Mr. CALDER. I will say the superintendent of police informs me that they were.

Mr. POMERENE. I have so understood; and there is very frequent occasions for their being called on such service.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the present amount they receive hardly enables them to pay the upkeep of their automobiles; and it seems to me they ought to have the amount suggested by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the testimony disclosed that last year it cost $600 for a police surgeon to provide automobile service alone; and the constant change in the medical and surgical force shows that it is only the young practitioner who is treating the policemen and firemen of this city. That ought not to be; for the men in the police and fire departments are entitled to as good medical and surgical service as is the private citizen, and they can not get it under the present rate of pay.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that that is so; but if we are going largely to increase the salary of the police surgeons, then let us give them the right kind of a salary and provide that they shall devote all of their time and attention to the work of the police and fire departments. All Senators know, I think, that where a man devotes part of his time to Government work and part of his time to private practice he is not going to neglect his private practice to take care of the work he is called upon to perform for the city.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it amounts to this: If we ask them to devote all their time to the work, we can not secure the services of physicians and surgeons in Washington for this character of work unless we pay them from $6,000 to $8,000 a year. We are getting in many respects as good medical service as Washington affords, because of the fact that the police surgeons are allowed to engage in outside practice; they come in and give to the members of the police force and to the firemen just as conscientious and able service as the private patient receives; but the surgeons can only afford to do that for $1,800 a year when they are permitted to pursue their practice outside. I would not, however, make any especial contest over this matter, for I wish to get the bill through.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that the surgeons give preference to the policemen and firemen?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; they are required to do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And if they neglect any practice, they must neglect their private practice.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee having jurisdiction of the District of Columbia appropriation bill has gone into this question a number of times. I served on that committee during my previous service in the Senate as well as during my present service, and never in my recollection has any member of the board of commissioners asked for any such increase for these officials. The members of the subcommittee, I think, will substantiate what I say that in this instance no showing was made to the subcommittee having charge of this bill that would justify the giving of more than what was carried in the bill as reported to and passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I fail to see how any city could expect to secure the services of competent physicians to care for over 900 policemen and in the neighborhood of 400 firemen, having a prior claim on their services, for less than $1,800 a year. I think the compensation at $1,800 is ridiculously small.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, in New York City to-day the police surgeons are paid $3,500; in Philadelphia, $4,000; in St. Louis, $1,800 to $3,000; in Pittsburgh, $2,670; in Detroit, $2,000 to $2,250; in Los Angeles, $1,650 to $2,400; in New Orleans, $2,300; and in Jersey City, $2,800.

Mr. BALL. And in Wilmington, Del., they receive $2,500.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Delaware says that in Wilmington they are paid $2,500, and Wilmington is a city much smaller than Washington.

Mr. WATSON. How many of them are there in this city?

Mr. CALDER. Four.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it seems to me from what I have heard that the "white wings" are paid as much as the police surgeons of this city; and I have a faint notion that where a man has prepared himself for the practice of medicine he ought at least to have a compensation in keeping with such attainments.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the police surgeons were required to give all of their time to the police practice, there could be no question about the justice of the comment made by the Senator from Ohio; but we have not yet ascertained what their outside incomes are. They may be very large. I am quite willing, for the purpose of getting this bill disposed of, particularly on account of the admirable arrangement it makes of the police force, to go as far as any man in supporting the bill that has been reported by the committee; but if it be true that these surgeons have a good practice outside, then surely the compensation which is provided by this bill may be more than generous. However, as to that I do not know; a great deal would depend upon the extent of their practice.

I think the Senator having the bill in charge made the statement that this work was being performed largely by the younger men. I should like to ask some member of the committee if he can give the Senate any information as to the approximate amount of the incomes of the police surgeons derived from their private practice.

Mr. CALDER. I do not think that information can be furnished by any member of the committee. I was chairman of the subcommittee which prepared the bill. We did not make that inquiry; but the chairman of the Board of District Commissioners and the superintendent of police informed us that they had difficulty in keeping good men; they thought that they were much underpaid; that they had private practice, of course, but they gave much of their time to the duties devolving upon their official position; and that it cost them alone nearly all they were receiving for their automobile expenses.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he allow this matter to go to conference as it now stands, where it may be worked out satisfactorily and the points raised here can be thoroughly examined.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I do not like to oppose this measure, but it does seem to me that if the police surgeons had been entitled to this increase some showing to that effect would have been made before our committee previous to this time. I think that it is a very large increase. It seems to me that an increase from $840 to $1,400, to which would be added the $240 bonus, making $1,640 in all, is sufficient, and I am going to ask for a vote on my amendment to reduce the amount from $1,800 to $1,400.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, on page 6, line 12, to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$1,400." [Putting the question.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following:

> No organization of governmental employees shall affiliate with any outside organization which uses the strike or which assists any other organization in the use of the strike in the adjustment of grievances.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the bill as reported I think effectively provides that members of the Metropolitan police force shall not be affiliated with any superior organization or union of labor, or any organization empowered to counsel or aid or abet in strikes.

I have examined the provision put into the bill by the committee, which covers that subject, and I am fairly well satisfied with it. I believe that it will be effective. In fact, the policemen of the District, I think, have done the graceful and proper thing by voluntarily severing their connection with the American Federation of Labor, and I give them credit for it. They appear to have been willing to do so and to have done so when advised by Members of Congress that it was against the sentiment of a large element of Congress, and when shown that it was in conflict with what Congress believed to be their paramount duty to the Government. I am well enough satisfied on that score. I think the committee has done its duty properly, and I think the policemen have yielded to the sentiment of the committee gracefully and properly.

My amendment, however, goes to the affiliation of any or all employees of the Government with higher organizations than their own unions, composed of their own associates. It goes to the question of any organization of Government employees affiliating with the American Federation of Labor or any other superior organization. I believe the same reasons which militate against that affiliation as to the policemen of the District in large measure militate against any character of organized Government employees affiliating with a higher body of organized labor which has claims upon them which may conflict with their duty to the Government and with the claims of the Government upon them. I believe the whole system is bad. I believe that all of the reasons which go to prevent policemen from affiliating in that capacity apply with some measure of force to all Government employees.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I do not believe the amendment is necessary, in view of the wording, but I am willing to accept it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the amendment. My point of order is that it applies to employees of the Government service who do not belong to the Metropolitan police force who might belong to the Post Office Department or any other department of the Government.

This bill touches the Metropolitan police force. It has gone very far in safeguarding the Metropolitan police force; but it does not seem to me that we ought to go out into a field of speculation and apply something here that we are not applying to all the other employees of the Government.

Mr. MYERS. There is no speculation at all about it. The amendment is aimed at just what the Senator from Mississippi says it is apparently aimed at.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the reason why I make the point of order.

Mr. MYERS. That is its very purpose; but I contend that the point of order is not well made. This is not an appropriation bill. General legislation may be put upon this bill. It is not an appropriation bill, and I know of no rule which prevents general legislation being offered as an amendment to any bill other than an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order. As this is not an appropriation bill, and as the title of the bill is broad in its nature, specifically stating "for other purposes," the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MYERS. Then, I will address a few remarks to the amendment. I shall try to do so at not too great length.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee has accepted the amendment.

Mr. MYERS. Then, I will leave it to the chairman, he having accepted it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will have to pass upon the amendment.

Mr. MYERS. Then, as the Senate has to act upon it, I should like to say a few words further. I shall try to do so not at any great length.

This is a subject which has attracted the attention of the heads of the Government departments for a long time. It has engaged their earnest thought and consideration. It has engaged the consideration of Congress to a very great degree; and I believe that the practice which has grown up of employees of the Government in the various departments forming themselves into a union or an association among themselves and then affiliating with the American Federation of Labor is a bad practice, bad in principle, and is detrimental to the best interests of the Government, and the best interests of the employees. It undoubtedly affords an opportunity to some extent for a dual allegiance. It undoubtedly affords a field for a divided allegiance by those who are employed by the Government, who owe all of their time and labor and efforts, within hours prescribed for them, to the Government, and owe all of their duty and their allegiance to the Government.

There is no doubt about the fact that the American Federation of Labor, or any other central or superior body of organized labor, claims some allegiance from the members of its subordinate branches. It not only expects it and requires it but in many instances, I am sure, exacts it; and, so far as Government employees are concerned, wherever it does, it is almost sure to go counter to the allegiance and the duty which employees owe to the Government. It is for the Members of Congress to say whether or not they want this widespread practice continued, and whether or not they approve of it. If they approve of it, if they believe it is right, if they uphold it, now is the time and here is the opportunity to give it their official sanction and approval.

I do not believe there is any valid objection to employees of a department of the Government forming an association of their own. Take, for instance, any department of the Government, say the Post Office Department. I do not believe there is any objection to its employees forming an association or a union of their own members, within their own department, and consulting together and meeting and devising plans for their own good and the advancement of their own interests, and in every legitimate way looking after their own welfare. I do not believe anybody has any serious objection to that. The time was when there was objection made to that privilege, but I do not believe the heads of the departments now object to it.

I believe it is a reasonable and legitimate sphere of action in which Government employees may act. I believe they have a right to meet once a month, or as often as they may desire, in a common meeting place, as an association or union, and to elect their officers, have by-laws, adopt resolutions, and to take other steps to look after their welfare and protect their interests; and, so far as I know, there is no longer any substantial objection to members of those associations or delegates from those departmental unions appearing before committees of Congress and urging increases of salaries, or better working conditions, or reasonable working hours, or urging anything that appertains to their interests.

I think by common consent it is admitted that Government employees may have that privilege. At any rate, they exercise it, and I see no objection to it. In industrial life I think that organized labor has its proper place. I believe that it may, within legitimate bounds, serve a good purpose, and has served many good purposes, and has accomplished much for its members. That is all right in the industries of the country, private enterprise, but when you come to say that Government employees should not only form their own departmental associations or unions, but that they should then affiliate with the American Federation of Labor or any other higher or superior or general body of organized labor, I think you are treading upon dangerous ground. The Government occupies a different sphere from private enterprise. If Government employees affiliate with a superior organization, they are bound to get to the point some time where there will be conflicting claims on those employees and conflicting interests.

It is said that the unions of Government employees which are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor have nonstrike charters, but there is nothing to prevent them from amending those charters and making them so that strikes would be permissible.

I have here a clipping from a recent issue of the Washington Post which I will read. It is as follows:

Mild rumblings of many months of a possible strike of union postal employees to bring about improved working conditions and increased wages were quieted finally yesterday when tabulation of the referendum vote of the members of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks resulted favorably for retention of the "no-strike" clause in the organization's constitution.

The result, which had been in process of polling since the middle of September, stood 9,460 against the clause—and 10,389 in favor. A two-thirds vote is required to change the federation constitution.

Against the nonstrike clause—

There was only a small majority of less than a thousand which was in favor of keeping the nonstrike clause in the charter. Next time an election is held a majority may vote to take the nonstrike clause out of the charter, and at some subsequent election the required two-thirds may vote to take it out.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. I understood the figures just read by the Senator to indicate that a majority voted in favor of eliminating the nonstrike clause—10,000 plus as against 9,000 plus—but that the articles of incorporation, or their by-laws, or their constitution, or whatever you call it, required two-thirds in order to eliminate the nonstrike clause, and, not getting the two-thirds, of course, the proposition did not carry; but that a majority of the organization favored strikes.

Mr. MYERS. I do not get that understanding of it. It says the vote stood 9,460 against the clause and 10,389 in favor of it. I suppose that means in favor of keeping the nonstrike clause—a majority of less than a thousand. At another election, and I suppose they can always have another one, if not this year, some other year, a majority might vote to take out this clause, and some other time two-thirds might vote to take it out.

There is no need of going into any extended argument on this. It is an old question, and Senators certainly must have their minds made up, and if Senators want to give their stamp of approval to the affiliation of Government employees with the American Federation of Labor, or any other higher or superior body of organized labor, now is the time and here is the opportunity to put their stamp of approval upon it. If you do not choose to give it your approval, you have an opportunity of withholding that approval and registering your dissent.

I also read in the Washington Post in the last few days an item which said that the local labor organizations of the District of Columbia had taken up a collection of quite a considerable sum of money and sent it to Pittsburgh to be used for the benefit of the striking coal miners.

Mr. THOMAS. Coal miners or steel workers?

Mr. MYERS. I think it was the coal miners. It was only in the last few days that the article appeared. It may have been the steel strikers, but that is not my recollection. I have not the clipping with me. Whatever it may be, I have no doubt that some employees of the Government who are members of local organizations of the American Federation of Labor contributed, directly or indirectly, to these strike benefits. If they did not go right down into their pockets and get the money and give it as a direct donation, the money was undoubtedly taken out of the local treasury, and was contributed in the way of dues from all of the members, and went to the maintenance of a strike which has upset the industrial life of this country and worked incalculable harm. If it went to the coal strikers, as is my impression, then it went to those who were engaged in what the President of the United States and a court of this country have declared an unlawful combination against the law and against the welfare and interests of the country and of the Government from which these employees are drawing their wages and deriving their support.

I have here a clipping from this morning's Washington Post, which says:

Declaring a grave misunderstanding exists about the requests of the striking coal miners for improved conditions, the Central Labor Union meeting last night in Musicians' Hall, 1006 E Street NW., indorsed the attitude of the American Federation of Labor in opposing the injunction to restrain officials of the United Mine Workers from carrying out the strike.

The resolution recites that the injunction restrains "a movement which has for its object only improved conditions for the miners." Its effect is to lend the moral and financial support of the central body to the miners, expressed through the parent body of organized labor.

The central body is made up of delegates from 99 local unions, which include approximately 100,000 workers in the District. District and Federal Government workers are included in this number, but in their charters are included nonstrike clauses, so that they can not be counted in the number likely to withdraw from work in sympathetic strikes.

While Government employees may not be expected to withdraw from their labors and go on sympathetic strikes, yet they can contribute their money, if they are so disposed, to keep up a strike which the President of the United States and a court of the land have declared to be unlawful.

I was speaking of the postal employees of the Government. I understand that all the employees of the Post Office Department are not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The American Federation of Post Office Clerks, about which I have just read a newspaper clipping, is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The Association of Letter Carriers, I understand, is not. In the last few weeks a number of members of an organization which is not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, the Association of Letter Carriers, have told me orally, and have written me in letters that I have received, that the American Federation of Labor for years past, through its agents, has made every effort to get the entire body of the post-office employees of the country to affiliate with the American Federation of Labor, and that its agents have promised the aid and assistance of the American Federation of Labor in getting higher wages and better working conditions and hours, and even have offered help in case of a strike, if it took that to get what the postal employees might demand of the Government.

I am told that members of the Association of Letter Carriers have resisted those overtures, but that the members of the other association of postal employees did not, and that the members of various departmental agencies have not resisted those overtures, and that most of them have affiliated themselves with the American Federation of Labor. I am told by Government employees, both orally and in writing, that the result of the demands of the railroad employees of three years ago, which secured the enactment of the Adamson law, has been held up to Government employees as an instance of what they could do by affiliating with a superior body of organized labor.

I have been told that the enactment of the Adamson law has been held up to nearly all of the Government employees who have formed local unions and associations among themselves as an inducement to affiliate with a superior body of labor, in order to get the force and influence of that higher body of labor behind all of their demands, and that the promise has been made that in doing so they would get the full power and force and influence of all organized labor in the United States back of their demands. They have been told, I am informed, that that force was so great that Congress dare not resist it, and that if they would affiliate with some of these higher and parent bodies they would in that way force Congress to give them whatever they might want, within any imaginable scope, in the way of increased wages.

This question has been before Congress for a long time, and I believe there are reasons now which are more acute than any that have ever before existed why Congress should register its will in this matter. I believe it has been brought to the attention of Congress by events within the last few weeks with more force than ever before. I believe the main object of the affiliation of local unions and associations of Government employees with higher bodies of labor is to keep over Congress an implied threat of a strike in case Congress does not grant all of the demands made upon it by those associations.

As I say, unconnected with any higher association of labor, I can see no reasonable objection to these local associations of Government employees amongst themselves. I believe Congress is perfectly willing to have their delegates and representatives come to the committees of Congress and to have committees hear their complaints. But when you go higher and put a more powerful influence back of them, one not connected with the Government, it can have none other than a sinister meaning, an implication that if Congress does not grant demands there will some time be a strike of Government employees, with a vast power back of it, which may make the strike successful.

There have been strikes attempted in the Post Office Department in the last few years. They have not been unknown, and they have not been successful; that is, they have been of short duration. But they are merely evidences of what is in the minds of some of the moving spirits of organization among the post-office employees, and indications of what the Congress may look for in the future unless some check is put upon this tendency.

I do not care to detain the Senate any longer. I think every Senator here has his views about these matters. The hour is getting late, and the attendance is small. But I urge the adoption of this amendment. I believe it would serve a good purpose, and would be in the interest of good service to the Government and conducive to the welfare of the entire people.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the committee. I do not think it has any business in the consideration of this particular bill. This is a bill relating to the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia. It proposes to increase their pay. The committee very wisely placed a provision in the bill which covers the point argued by the Senator from Montana, so far as it touches the Metropolitan police force.

The amendment to the amendment is very far-reaching. It is a most important proposition. It should not be passed hurriedly, with about a dozen Members of the Senate on the floor. It provides that—

> No organization of governmental employees shall affiliate with any outside organization which uses the strike or which assists any other organization in the use of the strike in the adjustment of grievances.

I do not know why the Senator did not provide a penalty for violation. The amendment, so far as the wording goes, is merely an expression of Congress as to how it stands on Government employees belonging to some organization that might affiliate with some other organization that might some time employ the strike.

As to whether any Government employees ought to belong to a labor organization or not, I care not to discuss. The postal employees organized themselves for their own protection. I doubt whether they would have ever received the increased pay that they did receive recently in a bill which was passed through Congress if they had not organized and brought public sentiment, by the presentation of facts, to bear upon Congress, which gave them the relief. This amendment would affect those employees. It seems to me that it would have been more proper for the Senator from Montana to have offered an amendment touching the employees of the Post Office Department affiliating with labor organizations that might have caused a strike when the postal bill was up for consideration. If the amendment to the amendment is adopted it will affect all those employees. If it should be adopted it would affect every employee who belongs to labor organizations and affiliates with some outside organization, who works in a munitions factory that belongs to the Government, and every employee who works in a navy yard who might belong to one of these organizations; aye, it even goes further than that. It affects the men who are employed on the railroads of the country which are now under Government ownership or operated by the Government. It is far-reaching in its effect, and I think we ought to reject the amendment in the consideration of this particular bill. I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the amendment of the committee.

On a division the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I offer another amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. To follow the amendment to the amendment last agreed to, and to be known as section 6:

> SEC. 6. That no woman shall be employed on or in connection with the Metropolitan police force in any other than a clerical capacity, or shall do in connection therewith any other than clerical work, and any woman working on or in connection with the police force contrary hereto shall receive no compensation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I understand that there has grown up in the District a system of putting a number of women on the police force, who are carried as policemen, with nothing to differentiate their duties from those of ordinary policemen. It is a practice in which I do not believe.

I know there is a belief throughout the country that every city ought to have a few women on the police force, that they should have peculiar duties assigned to them, but I do not believe in putting women on police forces. I do not believe it is a work for which women are fitted. I think it is a waste of money. I think it is a departure from a long-established idea, which has good reason behind it, that men only are fitted for police duty.

There is a tendency nowadays to have women do everything that men do, to invade every field of activity and industrial employment in which men are engaged. I believe that some discrimination should be used. I do not believe women should be barred from any field of activity for which they are fitted or from any employment which they can do as well as men, but I do not believe women can serve as policemen as well as men or that they are fitted for the duties. I think that God has created them for other purposes, to look after men in other ways than by being policemen.

A few weeks ago I clipped an article from the Washington Post which relates to women police here in the District, and I am going to read a part of it. It explains the ground of my objection to the service of women on the police force in the District. I read:

> Four policewomen are specifically authorized by appropriation, but there are at least 13 women serving not as policewomen but as policemen, and being paid from the appropriation for policemen, and if they continue to serve just that many men will be kept out of jobs on the force.
> Mrs. Mina C. Van Winkle, of Newark, N. J., who was made chief of the bureau on February 14, 1919, holds the rank and draws the pay of a first-class detective sergeant, and employs under her at different times special women investigators to visit the dance halls, theaters, parks, and other places of amusement and recreation.
> Among the involved duties of the members of this bureau drawing police pay but hardly available for riot duty as set forth by Mrs. Van Winkle may be cited:
> "Psychopathic and physical examinations with the view to securing proper disposition of the case and treatment.
> "Thorough investigation to find all negative and positive facts in the case in order to arrive at the inner mental life of the girl, so that intelligent help can be extended."
> An example of how this higher police duty works out was furnished recently by the case of Grace Raezer, said by her mother to be 16 years old.
> This girl, whose brother, Sergt. John Raezer, was killed in France, and whose father was serving as a lieutenant in the American Expeditionary Forces in France, was living with her mother, Mrs. Stella Buck, in the northwest section of the city. The girl drew $57 a month pension from the Government through the death of her brother and also received remittances from her father, while her mother, divorced and remarried, was employed as a housekeeper in the home of a prominent resident of the city and aided in the care of his two motherless children. The daughter frequently accompanied and assisted her mother in the care of the house and children.
> One night, as the daughter lingered downstairs after returning home with her mother, she was approached by a strange woman, who said:
> "You are under arrest, so come along quietly."
> The woman was Miss Ethel McQuiston, attached to the women's bureau of the police department.
> The girl called to her mother, who followed and demanded to know why her daughter was arrested. She was told that if she didn't keep quiet she, too, would be placed under arrest, and the daughter was warned against talking to her mother.
> Miss Raezer was taken to the house of detention, stripped of her rings and jewelry, and later taken to police headquarters, where she was brought before Mrs. Van Winkle and other members of the bureau for examination.
> There, according to her mother, she was subjected to a "third degree" of cross-examination that would have shocked the oldest offender in a prison for totally depraved women. The girl recoiled from the questions that were shot at her like blows from a whip and was in a deplorable state when finally told, without any word of explanation, that she was free to return to her home.
> Inspector Burlingame, who was on duty at headquarters at the time, said: "There is not a word against the character of the girl."
> Maj. Pullman, when asked about the case, was reported as saying:
> "I know nothing about it. It was one of those cases handled by the woman's division."
> Later, when pressed for some statement about the case, he is quoted as saying:
> "No harm has been done, and forget about it."

"My daughter has never been away from me for one night since she was born," said Mrs. Buck. "Her reputation is as sacred to me as my life. I propose to see this matter through and make it certain that the police can never again subject a child to such atrocious suffering without the slightest cause."

Former Senator Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, who knew the girl's father, was appealed to, and is said to have failed to receive any satisfactory explanation of her treatment up to this time.

Most of the women who are filling policemen's jobs in the women's bureau have the rank of class 1 privates, and the monthly pay roll for the bureau is approximately $1,300. It is said that Maj. Pullman and Commissioner Brownlow are so well pleased with the work of the bureau that they intend to increase its personnel to 30 to do the work outlined by Mrs. Van Winkle, in part, as follows:

Preventive: Supervision and general survey of movies, dance halls, skating rinks, railway stations, parks, large public gatherings, welfare work by special workers, voluntary probation, finding positions for girls, advising as to associates, amusements, etc.

The corrective and general police work are along the same lines.

Mrs. Van Winkle offered her services free about October 1, she says, by advice of her friends, who instanced alleged conditions among women war workers here, as well as resident girls. She says she is not in the work for "amusement," but that it is her life work. She places her own car and chauffeur at the disposal of members of her bureau, and as she does not need the salary of $2,040 which she draws, is said to devote most of it to the work of the bureau.

There must be some truth in that article. I have never seen it denied. It was published in a reputable paper. If there were no truth in it, a responsible paper would hardly have dared to publish it.

This is only one of a number of articles of like kind and character that I have seen in the city press. I have seen recited a number of other instances of the women's bureau of the police force in the District which are very analogous to this, and I am opposed to all such doings. For that reason I offer the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I supported the first amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, but I am obliged to vote against this one. The use of women upon the police forces of the different cities of the country is a somewhat recent innovation, but it has proven very beneficial. There are certain phases of lawbreaking, certain cases of delinquency, particularly among young girls, which can be reached and prevented by a vigorous policewoman in many cases where the interference of a man would be embarrassing, if not unsuccessful.

I have no doubt of the truth of the incident which the Senator has called to the attention of the Senate, but if a system is to be repudiated because of such an incident what would become of the police systems of America? In the administration of the duties of a policeman it is a common thing for private rights to be invaded and a great deal of offense given, and justly given. Unfortunately those things are inseparable from the enforcement of law and order; but there is always a remedy in the shape of a suit for damages against the offending officer, who may also be disciplined and removed if he or she is proven to have been guilty of any infraction of duty.

I think it would be a great mistake to deprive the authorities having charge of police affairs and also charged with the duty of enforcing the law and order in the city of Washington of the right to employ efficient women in such number as may be necessary for looking after such phases of police duty as are peculiarly within their province.

I may allude to a successful instance of the discharge of the duties of a policewoman as an offset to the case to which the Senator from Montana has called attention. About two months before the armistice a woman was employed as traffic policeman in the city of Washington and stationed at the intersection of Seventh Street with Massachusetts Avenue. She performed the duties of that place for about two or three months with unusual ability. She was a very attractive woman. She performed her duties so well that a great many of the owners of automobiles went out of their way for the purpose of subjecting themselves to her orders in order that they might obey them.

Mr. MYERS. May I inquire if the Senator from Colorado was one of them?

Mr. THOMAS. If I had had a machine, I should have gone by that intersection going and coming to my duties here every day. I availed myself of the invitation of a friend, who was an enthusiastic admirer of the efficiency of this woman, and accompanied him to the Capitol by way of that particular route, and I confess I took as much interest in her splendid administration of her duties as did the admiring throng which preceded and succeeded the machine which I occupied.

Indeed, the attraction was so great that I understand there was a substantial diminution of automobile service on Pennsylvania Avenue; that F Street also suffered, and Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets as well. Unfortunately the armistice came, and, this woman being the wife of a prominent officer stationed in the city whose duties called him elsewhere, Washington was deprived of her valuable services.

Mr. President, I am serious in calling attention to the particular instance because, independent of any other consideration, the efficiency with which the crowds were handled and the traffic was conducted by this woman was unusual. It was equal to the best in the veteran service in New York City.

But I shall not detain the Senate upon the subject. I do not think we ought to place this limitation upon the power of the chief of police, and I should dislike very much to see the duties of women as policewomen circumscribed in this city as the amendment would circumscribe them.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from Montana will not prevail. From my observation, while there may have been some rare cases which might justify criticism, in the main the service of women on the police force in Washington has been excellent. I live in the city of New York, where there are over 50 policewomen. The police commissioner there recently in discussing the matter with me said they were one of the best arms of the service. They are used to detect crime where men can not be sent. Every important dry goods store in the country has women detectives. They can detect crime on the part of women and also on the part of men in some instances quicker and better than can men. Here in the city of Washington we have eight police matrons, who would certainly be discharged if the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] should prevail. I think some women are excellently adapted to police work, and I think it would be a mistake for this amendment to be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I merely want to ask the Senator from New York or the chairman of the committee a question touching the firemen of the District of Columbia. I notice that this bill provides increased pay for the members of the Metropolitan police force, and I desire to ask if it is contemplated to bring out a bill at any date in the near future providing increased pay for the firemen in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SHERMAN. Such a bill is now in the subcommittee, and at any early date it will, I think, be reported favorably, so far as I am authorized to state, I will say to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HARRISON. I have in my hand a bill which was introduced in the other House touching the pay of firemen.

Mr. CALDER. The bill has passed the House.

Mr. HARRISON. It has passed the other House?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. And the subcommittee is now considering the question in the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; and it may be that within a week the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. It would seem to me just as important to increase the pay of the firemen as to increase the pay of the policemen of this city.
